Without in any way minimizing the other important authorities granted in this bill, I would like to call special attention to the construction authorizations contained in this bill for a highly important purpose. That purpose is to support the activities of the Military Air Transport Service which performs a vital and indispensable role in support of our strategic and tactical Air Force wartime operations and combat operations of the Army, Navy, and Marines, as well as the performance of military support operations in peacetime.

This bill provides construction authorizations of almost $5 million at MATS bases. An additional $7 million for direct support of MATS also is provided as part of the programs at the bases of other Air Force commands. In addition, authorization is contained in the bill for the construction of 600 units of family housing at 2 MATS bases utilizing private capital under the provisions of Title VIII of the National Housing Act. This construction alone, however, does not give a full picture of the extent of the MATS operations, for MATS operates from many farflung locations covering virtually every area of the world and jointly utilizes facilities at bases of other Air Force commands. The MATS construction authorizations will provide airfield, aircraft maintenance, and terminal facilities, navigational aids and essential personnel support facilities.

The Military Air Transport Service began the second decade of its history on June 1, 1958. Its primary mission is to maintain a state of readiness and capability to provide necessary airlift to meet wartime requirements of the Department of Defense. Although MATS has undergone major internal changes during its first 10 years, this mission has remained unchanged.

MATS is a modern up-to-date system. In the event of aggression, the ready and prompt ability to fulfill its mission may well be a vital factor in our success. Such a concept demands modernization with the latest technological advancements. Ten years of experience in this basic combat mission have enabled MATS to organize, to equip and to keep crews up to date and in step with the times. MATS today is flexible, adaptable, and modern.

MATS, a major Air Force command, was formed by consolidating two wartime air transport agenices—the Air Transport Command and the Naval Air Transport Service. MATS cut its teeth on the famous Berlin airlift. Both Air Force and Navy personnel and aircraft took part in the 14-month Operation Vittles to provide over 2 million tons of food, fuel, and medicine to Berlin and her beleaguered population of 2,500,000 people.

MATS has demonstrated its capabilities in other dramatic airlifts—the Pacific airlift in support of United Nations forces in Korea; the airlift of high-priority cargo and personnel during the construction of Thule Air Base in Greenland; Operation Wounded Warrior; airlift of United Nations troops and equipment to the Suez Canal Zone; and the Hungarian refugee airlift—Operation Safe Haven.

When the Korean war began in the summer of 1950, MATS was delivering approximately 70 tons of cargo to the Far East each month. Within 3 months, MATS transports were delivering up to 106 tons a day into Japan alone. The number of MATS Pacific airlift planes increased from 50 Douglas C–54's to a total of 160 MATS transports, plus 17 supplied by United Nations members and 66 leased from civil airlines. A total of 160,000 tons was airlifted in nearly 35,000 transpacific crossings before the Korean armistice was signed in 1953.

This Pacific airlift proved that air transport into a combat theater is not a one-way proposition. The return airlift was used to bring home combat casualties and other military patients as well as passengers from all services. Ninety percent of all evacuations of Korean wounded was by air. The result: Death rate from wounds was reduced from a World War II figure of 4 percent to lower than 2 percent. Medical air evacuation is now standard procedure.

In 1951 another rigorous test of MATS strategic airlift capability was the movement of personnel and materiel into Thule, Greenland. Moving bulldozers, power shovels, road graders, trucks, fuel, and, in one instance, a heavy crane, MATS demonstrated the potential of airlift into isolated areas. MATS has been credited with advancing the completion date of construction on the far northern base by a full year.

During 1954 MATS flew the longest aerial mercy mission in aviation history. More than 500 French troops wounded at Dien Bien Phu in Indochina were flown three-quarters of the way around the world in Operation Wounded Warrior.

In December 1956, the Hungarian refugee airlift Operation Safe Haven and the airlift of the U.N. police troops headed for the Suez area, once again proved that MATS was organized for D-day readiness. MATS flew 9,700 Hungarian refugees to America, including several thousand passengers carried by civil contract airlines.

MATS was called on to deliver supplies and equipment in support of Operation Deep Freeze—airlift support for Naval Task Force 43 in the Antarctic. Everything from the kitchen sink and a food mixer to a 3-ton Weasel and a 7-ton tractor was dropped at the Antarctic base. Despite some of the worst weather and radio blackout conditions ever recorded, the drops were remarkably successful.

Even more recent dramatic evidence of the importance and readiness of the MATS and the tactical troop carrier forces occurred in the last year during the periods of tension in Taiwan and Lebanon. MATS and troop carrier aircraft moved Army forces and supplies almost overnight during the Lebanon crisis. Within 73 hours after receiving orders to deploy, the first cargo aircraft was unloading its cargo of F–104 fighter planes and their pilots at Taiwan when the Chinese Communists attacked Quemoy last summer. Needless to say, this operation made a good impression on our friends, and perhaps an even stronger impression on the Chinese Communists.

The capability of airlift forces will expand during the coming year as aircraft modernization is applied.

MATS has entered the missile and space age with the latest in transport equipment. In 1948 the fleet was mainly composed of Douglas C–54 aircraft, but Operation Vittles graphically demonstrated the value of larger transports for strategic airlift. Over the years MATS has been gradually replacing obsolete aircraft with new planes designed for greater speed, range, and aircraft load—the Boeing C–97 Stratocruiser in 1949; the Douglas C–124 and R6D in 1951; the Douglas C–118 in 1952; the Lockheed R7V in 1953; the Lockheed C–121 in 1955; and in August 1957 MATS received its first swift, long-range turboprop—the Douglas C–133, which ushered in a new era in oceanic flight. The introduction of a jet cargo aircraft into the MATS force beginning in 1961 will increase total airlift capability.

While the command is perhaps best known for its airlift role, MATS is not solely an air transport organization. There are other equally vital services within MATS—the Air Force technical supporting services:

Air Weather Service—AWS—provides meteorological data on a global scale to U.S. Air Force and Army units. Beginning in 1917 as part of the Signal Corps, AWS now mans hundreds of weather stations in numerous countries throughout the world. A net of weather observation stations, both manned and automatic, is spread throughout the northern hemisphere. Also the Air Weather Service severe weather warning system, developed largely to enable aircraft to be moved from the path of dangerous storms, has been effective, with some adaptations, in warning the civil population of storms. Weather reconnaissance has added much to our knowledge of hurricanes and typhoons.

Airways and Air Communication Service—AACS—transmits this mass of weather data. AACS also operates fixed aeronautical point-to-point and ground-to-air radio stations, airdrome control towers, electronic navigation aids, landline facilities and teletype stations, cryptographic sections and message centers. AACS works in close cooperation, and jointly, with the FAA, in these vital aircraft and airspace control functions.

As the installing and operating agency for the USAF's Global Communications Systems, AACS transmits millions of messages monthly.

Another significant MATS service is STRATCOM, a worldwide communications network installed by AACS.

Air Rescue Service—ARS—is most dramatic of the MATS services. With its motto "That Others May Live," ARS was organized primarily to save the lives of Air Force crews involved in aircraft accidents. ARS humanitarian emergency work ranges around the world, covering both military and civilian crises.

ARS history is crowded with outstanding achievements. In recent months Rescue directed all operations by units of the Department of Defense during the two great New England floods and the floods in California. Rescue also has led the fight against floods in Japan, Italy, England, Holland, Mexico, Costa Rica, and at home in Kansas and Texas.

One of the most decorated and honored units of the Korean conflict was a detachment of the 3d Air Rescue Group, which completed 9,690 rescues within the combat area. Of this total, 996 United Nations personnel were rescued from behind the enemy lines. For this work the men of the 3d Air Rescue Group received the Air Force Association's flight trophy in 1953.

The Air Photographic and Charting Service—APCS—is the youngest member of MATS. Operating photographic and aerial mapping units throughout the world, this organization handles the overall photographic requirements of the Air Force.

MATS has an unparalleled safety record. In fact, military and civilian passengers on MATS scheduled flights are afforded worldwide accident insurance protection at regular commercial airline rates. In 1950 and again in 1954 MATS won the Daedalian Trophy for the lowest Air Force accident rate per 100,000 flying-hours. Transport operations achieved a rate of only two accidents per 100,000 flying-hours in 1954. In 1957 MATS had its lowest accident rate, with and overall rate of 3.9 per 100,000 flight-hours and 1.08 per 100,000 hours in transport operations.

Specialized aircraft development, such safety devices as antiskid brakes and anticollision lights, improvements in navigational aids, communications techniques, and other equipment, have all contributed to this outstanding record.

This is the Military Air Transport Service. Its transport divisions and diversified support services are potent factors in the maintenance of world peace.

Since October 1957 MATS has operated and controlled this vast and important military system from headquarters at Scott Air Force Base, near Belleville, Ill. This is one of the major installations of today's Air Force, and it is the home of other important Air Force activities, in addition to MATS Headquarters. These include a MATS transport squadron, an Air Training Command technical training group, and an Air Force Reserve troop-carrier squadron. Over 4,000 military personnel are stationed at this base, and it employs about 2,500 civilian workers.

Approximately $59 million have been invested to date for facilities at Scott Air Force Base. Two hundred and fifty-three thousand dollars for additional construction at Scott is contained in the authorization bill under consideration today, and the Air Force plans additional investments in future years to expand and improve the existing facilities.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, what I have to say today I hope will not be considered by the distinguished chairman and the members of the Committee on Armed Services as being criticism. If it is in the nature of criticism, it is constructive criticism. Looking over the proposed expenditures for construction and maintenance, and what have you, I note that little, if any, attention has been given by the committee to favor areas and States within our Nation that have tremendous unemployment at the present time. It is significant that those various States have little, if anything, in this bill that would help the unemployment situation.

I do want to digress long enough to express my thanks to the committee for continuing the appropriation for the only project that West Virginia has in the whole military setup, naval and otherwise. It is a naval installation at Sugar Grove, W. Va. I am deeply thankful that the committee is continuing to provide moneys or authorizing moneys to continue with the construction of this installation.

I might say to my distinguished chairman that after the little hassle we had on the floor here 3 or 4 years ago, I want to again take this opportunity to thank him, because he said then, "If the gentleman from West Virginia will keep quiet, we will give him some kind of an installation," and they did. But, it is only 6 miles from the West Virginia border; nevertheless it is in West Virginia.

I want to take this time to call the attention of the committee to a situation in West Virginia that needs the attention of the Committee on Armed Services. We have, at South Charleston, W. Va., an installation known as the Naval Armor Plate Plant. It was a World War I facility that cost the Government $134 million initially. It lay dormant between World War I and the outbreak of World War II. Then they came along in World War II and expended an additional $50 million for additional buildings. The Carnegie Steel Co. took it over and operated it and made all kinds of war material. We constructed small PT boats there and small destroyers. We manufactured all kinds of small arms; I forget what the bore of the cannons was that were made there. But, after World War II ended again it was revived and some of the buildings used and contracts let for Government production of military and naval equipment. Since the Korean war difficulties arose, it is being maintained by the Federal Government at a tremendous cost.

Inquiry at the Bureau of Naval Operations disclose an annual maintenance and upkeep cost of $535,000, exclusive of salaries of naval personnel. There are 8 naval officers and 306 civilians looking after the maintenance and storage.

We have this situation to contend with. They were so anxious to get that fine location of level land—most of it is as level as the prairie land of Kansas—that they entered into an agreement with the people from whom they bought it that any time they ceased to use it for defense purposes, title would revert back to the people. Here you have millions of dollars of Government money tied up. They do not want to sell it. The fact of the matter is, they cannot sell it. It is costing thousands upon thousands of dollars annually for maintenance purposes, because they keep it ready to go at any time. I am wondering, in view of the unemployment situation we have there, why there is not some activity underway at this time at that particular plant. With that much of a Government investment, why not make some use of this plant?

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 minutes, to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. Chairman, let me say to my good friend from West Virginia that I am quite familiar with this installation. As a matter of fact, back in 1916 or 1917 I was a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs when we authorized it. Ever since that time I have been resisting various efforts, some led by the community, some led by the State, to dispose of this piece of property. I do not think it should be disposed of. I think it should be utilized. I pledge the gentleman I shall continue to do everything I possibly can, and with his cooperation I hope we may be able to find a way in which it can be utilized, put in operation as an active Government installation.

Mr. BAILEY. I thank the gentleman very much.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MEYER].

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Chairman, it is absolutely essential that we provide properly for the defense of the United States. That includes the necessary military installations. However, I also feel that it is equally important to the defense of the United States that we properly utilize our dollars and our financial resources. Of course, it is most important that when we spend $3 for defense installations that we do not get only $2 of value. I am sure that the committee has investigated all of these items pretty well, but I should like in connection with one of them to get a little more information. This is in connection with Fort Sill in Oklahoma where they call for operational and training facilities and maintenance facilities in the amount of $5,337,000. I would like to know just what some of the operational and training facilities are.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to see that the distinguished gentleman from the icebound regions of Vermont has drifted down to Fort Sill in Oklahoma. It is refreshing to get his question, and I am happy to try to give him the full information. This provides an authorization of $5,337,000, and it is broken down in this way: A taxiway, compass swinging base, runway approach lighting, ordnance support battalion facilities for special weapons, three missile ground handling equipment buildings, three missile maintenance equipment shops and facilities.

There are also hardstand, missile maintenance equipment shops and facilities, a motor maintenance shop, and a motor park. Which one of these items is the gentleman inquiring about?

Mr. MEYER. In connection with the expenditure of these funds for these missile installations, will they require the purchase of any additional land in the future?

Mr. VINSON. I am quite familiar with all the land controversy down there. I am glad to say there is nothing in this bill or nothing contemplated in this bill right now with respect to expanding the land facilities at Fort Sill.

Mr. MEYER. I thank the gentleman very much.

Then I want to mention another item. Is there anything in this bill that might arise in the future about the following matter? Up in Vermont on our highest mountain, one of our great scenic areas, Mount Mansfield, there was a demand one time that they would need to use that mountain top for certain installations for observation purposes. When local objections were made, shortly thereafter they said that a new development in the missile field would no longer require the use of this area. Is there anything of that type injected into this bill?

Mr. VINSON. I want to say to my good friend that his question is so detailed I am not in a position to answer it. I just could not answer that kind of question. I know there is nothing in the bill relating to it. Of course, I cannot tell what is going to be running through the minds of the planners in the days to come. I have to deal with it as I come to the bridge. It is not involved in this bill at all now. I am sorry I cannot help the gentleman there today.

Mr. MEYER. I thank the gentleman very much.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GROSS].

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, within the last year there has been located in the Arlington Towers Apartments, in Virginia within a stone's throw of the Pentagon, an institution called the Military Training Institute. The contract for the operation of the Military Training Institute was farmed out to a psychology professor who has organized what is called the American Institute for Research.

Mr. VINSON. Let me say to my good friend there is not a line in this bill dealing with that subject. I know what is running through the mind of the gentleman. That is a school where men are trained for military aid work overseas.

Mr. GROSS. The school is designed to instruct officers in the military assistance program overseas.

Mr. VINSON. The State Department has a large voice in that military assistance. There is not a thing in this bill about it.

Mr. GROSS. I am pleased to hear the gentleman say that this bill carries no money for the operation of that Military Training Institute.

Mr. VINSON. When the Foreign Affairs Committee brings in its bill it will have jurisdiction of that. We do not.

Mr. GROSS. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. VINSON. We have enough trouble on our hands without going into that.

Mr. GROSS. I will say to the chairman that I think he could very well look into this kind of operation, where an absentee operator, a psychology professor at Pittsburgh, Pa., gets a cost plus a 6 percent fee contract to operate a military training institute. The function of the Army in peacetime is training. I believe the chairman will agree with me that it is their function in peacetime. Retired military personnel are being used in this school yet this former professor has a cost plus a 6 percent fee for the operation in some of the most expensive property in the District of Columbia area, all at taxpayer expense.

Mr. VINSON. May I say to the distinguished gentleman that I respect his remarks and will transmit them to the proper department. I am grateful to him for bringing it to the attention of the committee.

Mr. GROSS. I think the gentleman can help me with another question: What has been the fate of the San Jacinto Ordnance Depot at Houston, Tex., which was an item quite in controversy here a year ago when a bill similar to this came before the House?

Mr. VINSON. I have a letter from Secretary McElroy dated March 6, 1959. It reads as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE,
Washington, March 6, 1959.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: In accordance with the provisions of section 109, Public Law 85–685, I have had a thorough study made regarding the need for the Department of Defense to retain the San Jacinto Ordnance Depot.

As a result of my review of this study, I find that disposal of the San Jacinto Ordnance Depot and its outloading terminal will not be inimical to the national security. This study has also revealed that there is no need for the construction of a replacement ammunition outloading terminal at Point-Aux-Pins, Ala.

I have advised the Secretary of the Army of my findings and requested him to initiate appropriate action with the General Services Administration for the disposal of the San Jacinto Ordnance Depot in accordance with the provisions of section 109 of Public Law 85–685.

Sincerely,

NEIL MCELROY.

I think this letter answers the inquiry of the gentleman.

Mr. GROSS. I want to thank the gentleman for reading the letter into the RECORD because I have had some difficulty in getting informaion from the Pentagon on this particular subject. So, as I understand it now, this ordnance depot which is probably the best in the United States of America, which has deep sea loading facilities, being located on the ship channel just south of Houston, Tex., whose proud boast is "where 22 railroads meet the sea". In other words, it has easy access to railroad transportation to any point in the continental United States. It offers sea transportation of ammunition anywhere throughout the world, and it is now going to be disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, I thank both of my colleagues.

Mr. Chairman, as I was saying, this ordnance depot is now to be disposed of. It is an installation comprising 5,000 acres of land with 18 miles of railroad trackage and with miles upon miles of all-weather roads. Not more than a year ago, we were told that this ordnance depot held nearly 100 thousand tons of ammunition with a value of $120 million and yet, this is to be disposed of. Is that the understanding?

Mr. VINSON. That is the decision of the Secretary based upon the law. I say to my good friend, I have confidence in the judgment of the Secretary. The Secretary was directed to make a study. He did make a study. He appointed qualified people. He advised the Committee on Armed Services that in accordance with the law, he found it was all right to dispose of this installation—even to the extent that there is no need and no necessity of building a comparable one in Alabama.

Mr. GROSS. And, yet, only a year ago, Mr. Chairman—only a year ago—the Department of the Army, this same Defense Department, appeared before the gentleman's committee and said that this ordnance depot must be retained; that it was necessary to the defense and security of this country.

Mr. VINSON. You must bear in mind—and this statement is one that will be made often when it comes to a question of a change of opinion or a change in what we are doing—oftentimes new type of weapons that come into existence change our plans. If I may, I would like to make this statement and I will yield the gentleman additional time, if he wants it, but I pointed out previously that in a great many of these construction programs, millions and millions of dollars today are being spent based upon the use of man-operated airplanes. These in the course of time are going to fade away. We are hoping that when the missile era arrives—and we are getting closer and closer to it every day—that we can utilize some of these facilities that we are providing for today. Now, the same thing applies with reference to ammunition depots. There is no need and no necessity today to honeycomb the Nation with ammunition depots when we know that in the future we will not have to have the type of ammunition that we have to have today.

Mr. GROSS. To me this is a strange proceeding, that this splendid depot in Texas, just south of Houston, Tex., should be the first selected to go, under the conditions set forth.

Mr. VINSON. We have to start somewhere. I have confidence in the judgment of the Secretary of Defense. I am supporting his judgment, and I think he reached the right decision in regard to it.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois who has fought hard to retain this facility.

Mr. ARENDS. This became quite a controversial question last year in which I took part. Let me say that within the recent year surveys and studies have been made of the whole situation. We will try to find out all the necessary information in the committee later on.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. VINSON. There was submitted to the Armed Services Committee a few days ago for our consideration what is known as a real estate disposal project. There will again be a vote before this is finally disposed of.

Mr. GROSS. I am sure there will be. And I hope the chairman of the committee will give a full and fair hearing.

Mr. VINSON. I want the committee to understand this: On three separate occasions there has been a yea-and-nay roll call vote. On the first occasion the vote was 202 to 179. On another it was 376 to 2. On the conference report it was 256 to 135. On three separate occasions the issue has been joined and the House has approved of what the Secretary has now done.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

LAUGHLIN AND GOODFELLOW AIR FORCE BASES

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to refer to two Air Force installations which, while not represented by substantial new construction authorization in this bill, are vital installations in the Air Force, serving highly essential functions.

One of these installations is Laughlin Air Force Base, located at Del Rio, Tex. This base was dedicated in 1943 and named in honor of Lt. Jack Thomas Laughlin who was born in Del Rio, Tex., and graduated from the University of Texas. Lieutenant Laughlin served nobly with the Air Corps in defense of his country until he was killed in combat in January 1942 while flying a B–17 mission over Java. He was the first World War II pilot casualty from Del Rio, Tex.

Laughlin Air Force Base now is one of the major installations of the Strategic Air Command. This is a highly appropriate mission for the base following its earlier illustrious accomplishments as an advanced flying school for pilot training. Throughout World War II, Laughlin Air Force Base, then known as Laughlin Army Air Field, trained and sent to war theaters more than 2,200 B–26 pilots. Again, during the Korean conflict, Laughlin Air Force Base played a significant role in the necessarily increased pilot training program by the conduct of training in transition to the then new jet aircraft and gunnery.

Now as a SAC base, Laughlin is the home and operating base of a strategic reconnaissance wing of the Strategic Air Command. In that capacity, it plays a tremendously important role in the immense capabilities of the Strategic Air Command which today provides the primary deterrence to an aggression against this country.

The deterrent capability of the Strategic Air Command hinges mainly on the ability of SAC to retaliate with overwhelming force and annihilate any aggressor. This capability results from SAC's superior degree of efficiency and readiness which gives it the ability to keep a significant portion of its strike force alive and respond instantly even in the face of a massive surprise attack.

A key element in the attainment and continuance of this vital SAC deterrent capability are the bases in being from which the SAC reconnaissance and bomber units operate. As part of this key element, Laughlin Air Force Base, with its over 3,000 military personnel and 300 civilian employees, is admirably suited for its prominent and important contribution to the defense of our country.

The other installation of which I wish to speak is Goodfellow Air Force Base, which is near San Angelo in Tom Green County, Tex. This base was named for Lt. John J. Goodfellow, Jr., of San Angelo, who was killed in fighter combat in France in 1918.

Goodfellow Air Force Base was initially occupied in 1941 and, except for a brief inactive period following World War II, served until last year in a capacity, similar to Laughlin Air Force Base, of pilot flight training by the Air Training Command. On July 1, 1958, the base was transferred to the jurisdiction of the U.S. Air Force Security Service to use for highly specialized training of personnel who perform extremely essential communications-electronics intelligence and communications security functions in support of Air Force and other defense agency activities. Under its current utilization, over 2,000 military personnel, principally highly specialized technicians, will work or receive training, aided and supported by approximately 400 civilian employees.

In view of the specialized nature and critical importance of the function being performed by Goodfellow Air Force Base, it also takes a rightful place as one of the principal military installations making a vital contribution to national defense.

Though not among the largest installations in the Military Establishment, the nature and importance of the activities performed at Laughlin Air Force Base and Goodfellow Air Force Base, and the high quality of that performance, are such that the people of Texas and the rest of the Nation can be justifiably proud.

Mr. VINSON. I have no further requests for time, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

TITLE VI

SEC. 601. The Secretary of the Army is authorized to convey by quitclaim deed to the city of Santa Cruz, California, all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to four and five-tenths acres of land, more or less, comprising the United States Army Reserve Center Lighthouse Point site and being a part of the lands known as the United States Coast Guard Santa Cruz Light Station, situated on the northerly side of West Cliff Drive, approximately seven hundred feet south of Pelton Avenue, in the city and county of Santa Cruz, California, and in exchange for said conveyance to accept on behalf of the United States of America from the city of Santa Cruz a deed conveying fee simple title to not less than four acres of land situated within the city of Santa Cruz, California, to be utilized as the site for a United States Army Reserve Center: Provided, That the city of Santa Cruz pay to the United States a sum of money representing, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Army, the aggregate of (1) the amount by which the fair market value of the property so conveyed by the Secretary of the Army exceeds the fair market value of the land accepted in exchange therefor; (2) the amount heretofore expended by the Department of the Army in connection with the proposed construction of the United States Army Reserve Center at Lighthouse Point for work and materials which cannot be utilized in connection with the construction of the United States Army Reserve Center on the site to be acquired from the city; and (3) the amount by which the costs for providing adequate foundations, sewer and water facilities, and site preparation for the construction of a United States Army Reserve Center at the site to be acquired from the city exceeds the estimated costs for providing foundations, sewer and water facilities, and site preparation at the Lighthouse Point site.

The moneys received by the Secretary of the Army under this title shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts except that any moneys received under section 1(2) and (3) of this title shall be credited to the appropriation to which such costs are charged.

Mr. VINSON (interrupting reading of the bill). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered as read, printed in the RECORD, and open to amendment at any point in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendments: Page 2, line 11, strike "Savannah" and insert in lieu thereof "Savanna".

Page 24, line 10, strike "$225,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$255,000".

Page 40, following line 6, insert a new item as follows:

Page 69, line 6, strike "section 1" and insert in lieu thereof "section 601".

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VINSON: On page 20, line 11, strike "250 units" and insert in lieu thereof "450 units".

On page 40, following line 3, insert:

"Loring Air Force Base, Maine, 114 units."

On page 40, following line 9, insert:

"Travis Air Force Base, California, 600 units."

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, as I stated to the committee when I was presenting the bill, I offer this amendment.

These Capehart houses have all been approved by the President and would have been in the bill had they been passed on by the Budget prior to the time the Armed Forces Committee reported its bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ARENDS: On page 39, following line 12, insert a new item as follows:

"Chanute Air Force Base, Illinois, 180 units."

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, first I would like to say that Chanute Air Force Base is one of the major Air Force technical training schools.

I offer this amendment because the Air Force has a firm provable requirement for an additional 180 family housing units at Chanute Air Force Base.

Chanute is located adjacent to the town of Rantoul, Ill., which has a population—within the commutable area—of approximately 15,000 people.

The Air Force housing requirement is based on the missions at the end of fiscal year 1962. At that time, there will be approximately 600 officers and 5,400 airmen assigned to the base. Of these, 440 officers and 1,920 airmen—total 2,360—personnel will be authorized family housing. In addition, there will be a requirement for approximately 890 junior grade airmen for whom the Air Force is not authorized to provide housing.

Offsetting this requirement are 1,780 available, adequate housing units, consisting of 78 public quarters, 450 Capehart units—under construction—800 Wherry units, and 452 adequate privately owned units. This leaves a deficit of 580 units. Against this deficit the Air Force proposes to construct the 180 additional units.

Construction of the 180 units will provide onbase housing for only 64 percent of the authorized requirement, and will provide adequate housing, including the private rentals, for only 83 percent of those authorized housing.

I want to draw particular attention to the fact that this project has been approved by the Department of Defense and has been certified by the Federal Housing Administration.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I am thoroughly familiar with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois; I have examined it; I am acquainted with the facts. This item is of high priority. They have need for 2,360 units; they have available 1,780 units. There is a deficit of 580 units.

This amendment provides for only 180.

I think we would be warranted in trying to provide more.

I accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COHELAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COHELAN: Page 11, between lines 12 and 13, under the heading "Fleet Base Facilities", insert:

"Naval Station, Treasure Island, California: Utilities, $701,000".

Page 42, lines 19 and 20, strike "$113,253,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$113,954,000".

Page 42, line 22, strike "$182,283,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$182,984,000".

Mr. COHELAN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of my amendment is simply stated as being to provide a facility necessary to prevent the discharge in San Francisco Bay of raw, untreated sewage. At the present time naval facilities on Treasure Island and the Yerba Buena Island are discharging raw sewage into the bay.

On October 21, 1954, the California Regional Water Pollution Control Board of Region 2 established a resolution which stated that a condition of pollution and nuisance existed as a result of untreated sewage being discharged into San Francisco Bay from the shore facilities of the U.S. Navy at Treasure Island and Yerba Buena Island.

I would like to point out, Mr. Chairman, that this resolution has the force and effect of law in California. The effect of this disposal into San Francisco Bay today has become increasingly inimical to the welfare of the people of the State of California.

Executive Order No. 10014, dated November 3, 1948, requires cooperation and participation of the Federal Government in local pollution abatement programs. My amendment is in direct consonance with that Executive order and would be a major step forward in correcting a most serious situation in San Francisco Harbor.

It is my understanding that this item, which would cost $701,000, is very high on the Navy's priority list but fell out of the current program which we are considering today at the last moment.

This type of facility is sometimes considered by the military to be less attractive than some operational facilities. While I can understand the views of the military in this respect, I feel that this does constitute a sufficiently important item to warrant the full approval of this House.

Let me repeat, this is a high-priority item in the Navy's own program, but as it fell out of the program this year, so might it fall out again next year in competition with other apparently more attractive military requirements.

I most sincerely urge favorable consideration of this amendment as a truly necessary and even vital requirement for the San Francisco Bay area.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, I have had the privilege of examining this amendment. I know it is very high on the priority list and the objective is well founded. No community in America wants raw sewage flowing into its waterways. There is a large naval installation out there at Treasure Island that is polluting the water of San Francisco Bay.

This is an item that would increase the appropriation or authorization by $701,000. We reduced this bill $109 million under the budget estimate. If we accept this amendment then it will bring about a permanent reduction in the authorization to $108,546,000.

We have already done a magnificent job on this bill, so it will not hurt to accept this amendment providing for $701,000 additional.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether there is any money in this bill for the Air Force Academy or not.

Mr. VINSON. I can see that the gentleman and I are thinking alike. There is not one dollar in here for the Air Force Academy.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, there is an item or two that I think should be called to the attention of the House in connection with what is going on at the Air Force Academy. I find in a report issued by the Comptroller General of the United States in February 1959, which is not too long ago, a statement by a Member of the Senate, to be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 100, part 2, page 2798, as follows:

> I might say that the top limit of the original appropriation requested was $146 million, and the committee voted to make the top limit $126 million instead of $146 million without serious objection on the part of the Air Force.

Turning to the report that was issued in February of this year by the General Accounting Office we find that the total estimated cost of establishing, constructing, and equipping the Air Force Academy, exclusive of aircraft, is shown on page 18.

I read from the summarization:

> The recorded Air Force cost as adjusted as of August 31, 1958, $176,691,505.
> Related costs (Capehart housing and Federal grants for school construction), $20,860,162.
> Additional planned requirements (approved and unapproved), $72,261,970.

That is a total of $269,813,637 as compared with the statement to be found in the RECORD on March 8, 1954, of an estimated cost of $126 million.

Now, then, on page 10 of this report from the General Accounting Office I find this:

> The cost of construction items amounting to $3,479,866 was improperly charged to other appropriations. As a result of congressional hearings in June 1958, adjustments were made by the Air Force for $938,068. We intend to inform the Secretary of the Air Force that additional adjustments of $2,541,798 should be made.

And the report goes on to list the adjustments that must be made including $938,068.

Here are a few items:

Removal of slash and debris, $108,064.

Bowling alleys—social center, $94,052.

Bowling alleys—base exchange, $97,160.

Swimming pool dividers, $171,112.

Valet units—cadet quarters, $364,798.

Medicine cabinets—cadet quarters, $102,882.

I do not know what the medicine cabinets are, but I assume they are the kind of cabinets you have in the bathroom in your home or apartment. I do not know what else they could be. But the amount is $102,882.

Now, I wonder when somebody is going to put the brake on this Air Force Academy construction program. Something needs to be done, and badly.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GROSS. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. VINSON. I am happy to say that we already have put the brakes on. The figure in the organic law was $126 million. By two or three amendments we raised the cost to about $140 million, total construction. And, there is not one dollar in this bill for the Academy. So, we have in that way conformed with the Comptroller's report. I have it here, and I am glad the gentleman is reading it and will continue to read it on some other of there items. It is very illuminating. So, rest assured that there is not one penny in this bill today for the Air Force Academy. The brakes are on now.

Mr. GROSS. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. COHELAN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GUBSER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. GUBSER: On page 55, after line 7 and before line 8, insert the following:
> "San Jose, California: Parking lot and drill grounds, $1."

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I have had the privilege of examining this amendment. It is an exchange of property without cost to the Government; almost to the foot an equal exchange of property. I have no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. GUBSER].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SMITH of Mississippi, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 5674) to authorize certain construction at military installations, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 245, he reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were yeas 379, nays 7, not voting 48, as follows:

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their remarks on this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

PROGRAM

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute in order to inquire of the majority leader as to the program for the balance of this week and for next week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, there is no further program for the balance of this week. We are all caught up with rules reported out by the Rules Committee.

As the Rules Committee failed to report out a rule today on the housing bill, we will, of course, have to wait until calm judgment reconsiders and brings out a rule. We are all caught up.

I have no legislative program to announce for next week.

Starting Wednesday evening, of course, begin the holy days of our friends of the Jewish faith. That means there would be legislation only on Monday and Tuesday. So if the Rules Committee should meet Monday—I have no knowledge that they will—but if they should I would feel under all the circumstances that I should not program legislation for next week.

So there is no further program for the rest of the week and there is no program for next week except on Monday the calls of bills on the Consent Calendar and on Tuesday the call of bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested to me, and I think it is a very good one, that we call bills on both the Consent and Private Calendars on Monday next. So if the gentleman from Indiana has no objection, I ask unanimous consent that the call of bills on the Private Calendar for Tuesday next may take place on Monday next.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY NEXT

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

AWARD TO COL. THOMAS J. FLYNN

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, I include therein a recent article from the Gardner (Mass.) News regarding the conferring of the Good Citizenship Award of the Ovila Case Post, VFW, of Gardner, Mass., upon my dear and distinguished friend, Col. Thomas J. Flynn.

I know of no one who is more worthy of this illustrious Good Citizenship Award than Colonel Flynn. His unselfish service has been distributed over many fields of patriotic and civic endeavor. He served in wartime with great distinction in the armed services and achieved high rank in the Army and Reserve.

Colonel Flynn is a courageous fighting man himself and his two fine sons, both graduates of the U.S. Military Academy, are now carrying out his fine example and are serving with great credit in our Armed Forces.

For years he has been an inspiring leader in civic and community movements in Gardner and his constructive work for the business, industrial, and economic interests of that beautiful city is widely hailed by all his fellow citizens.

His contributions in the field of youth activities have been peerless and it is most appropriate that a plaque for outstanding service to the youth of Gardner, the community as a whole, and to the country as a soldier, a citizen, and a newspaperman should be conferred upon him.

It is a real pleasure and privilege for me to congratulate him and his family, and also to thank and commend the officers and members of Ovila Case Post, VFW, for so appropriately conferring this award upon such a sterling American as Colonel Flynn.

Would that the Nation had more leaders and devoted citizens like Colonel Flynn.

GOOD CITIZENSHIP AWARD PRESENTED AT VFW DINNER—MORE THAN 225 ATTEND TESTIMONIAL FOR COL. T. F. FLYNN—LAUDED FOR COMMUNITY EFFORTS

Col. Thomas F. Flynn, dean of Gardner's newspaper reporters, was presented the third annual "Good Citizenship" award last night by the Veterans of Foreign Wars at a testimonial dinner in the VFW quarters on West Street.

An overflow delegation of friends and associates, more than 225 at final count, enjoyed a corned beef and cabbage dinner and speaking program arranged to honor the veteran reporter and sports editor of The Gardner News for his contribution to the civic betterment of, the community through the years.

The guest speaker, former Chief of Police Cyrille LeBlanc, echoed the sentiments of his legion of friends when he stated that the guest of honor was dedicated to every worthy cause which arises in the community.

The presentation of the award, a handsome inscribed plaque, climaxed the speaking segment of the program and was made by VFW post commander Donald J. Casavant.

Ex-Chief LeBlanc, now personnel manager at Harrington Richardson Arms Co., in Worcester, drew on his long personal association and experiences with Colonel Flynn to commend the guest of honor for his service to worthy projects, his assistance to needy students in obtaining scholarship aid, and his participation in both global conflicts as a soldier in World Wars I and II.

Colonel Flynn and former Chief LeBlanc were coauthors of "Gardner in World War II", a history of Gardner's participation in the Second World War complete with pictures and biography of the men and women who served in the armed services.

Colonel Flynn, who has nearly 40 years with The Gardner News as city hall and police beat reporter, responded briefly, thanking the host organization and the committee for their efforts on his behalf.

State VFW Commander Joseph Scerra was the presiding officer. Among the head table guests who spoke briefly were Alfred J. Abbott, editor of The Gardner News; Chief of Police Joseph Renes; Council President Thomas J. Carroll and State Representative Martin H. Walsh, who injected a bit of Irish humor into this St. Patrick's Day party by reading a humorous "letter" from an aunt in Ireland.

Also seated at the head table were past VFW award recipients Hugh Hunter and Philip J. Tarpey, Commander Casavant, National VFW Chaplain Donald Patterson, and the guest of honor's brother, John Flynn of Reading. Called upon to acknowledge introductions were Fire Chief James F. Casavant, Judge M. Alan Moore, Postmaster Oscar R. Anderholm, VFW Quartermaster Adjutant John Powers, former Wildcat athlete Philip J. Tarpey, Jr., and Col. Walter Beaman.

Presenting a highly appropriate background for the head table was a portrait painting of Colonel Flynn in kelly green, an artistic production by Col. William V. Ellis.

Much of the success of the party was due to the excellent work of the committee in charge headed by School Committeeman Eugene T. McCarthy.

Caouette of Ashburnham catered.

IMPORTS CAN SOMETIMES BE DANGEROUS

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, I include therein a very thoughtful and well considered editorial entitled "Foreign Turbines and U.S. Security" which recently appeared in the celebrated Worcester (Mass.) Evening Gazette.

I was very much impressed with this editorial because it is sound, fair, and shows a keen awareness of the serious problems presented to American industries and workers as a result of poorly restricted foreign competition.

It should be obvious to any thinking citizen that considerations of national security and defense must always be paramount.

It should also be obvious, I think, that this Nation with its high wage scales and standards cannot hope, notwithstanding high productivity, to match or successfully compete with the extremely low wage scales and low standards that prevail in some other parts of the world.

Like everything else, this question calls for the application of the rule of reason. Naturally, we wish to promote sound commercial and business relations with other nations of the free world. At the same time, we must recognize that such relations must be predicated on respective national interests and mutual benefits, and cannot be based upon benefits to one side and detriments to the other in bi-lateral or multi-lateral trade.

The American textile industry is a good case in point. This industry has suffered, and is suffering, disastrous results from foreign competition. If the 'peril point' and 'escape clause' provisions of the Reciprocal Trade Treaties were fairly applied, if they were applied at all, it would be possible to avert some of these most unfortunate consequences to our industries and workers.

It does not make sense at all to refuse to utilize or apply existing provisions of law to prevent cutthroat competition and move instead to new proposals like the establishment of quotas or exchange restrictions to accomplish the same result.

I am not opposed to the use of quotas if they can be fairly and constructively applied; in fact, I would favor this additional method. On the other hand, I think it would be well for the executive end of the Government to make full use of existing provisions of law such as the 'peril point' and 'escape clause' provisions of the trade treaties and approve well-considered recommendations of the Tariff Commission promulgated after extensive testimony and long study.

The danger is that the effects of this cutthroat competition, unless it is checked by the action of our own Government, will spread to many other industries and cause additional serious unemployment at a time when our national unemployment rate is already high and seems to be continuing in many industries throughout the Nation, notwithstanding the general prosperity that exists in the country at large.

The Gazette is to be complimented upon the spirit of sanity and soundness which is evident in this constructive editorial and the marked ability with which its views were presented.

FOREIGN TURBINES AND U.S. SECURITY

The Los Angeles Board of Water and Power Commissioners recently asked for bids on two huge turbine generators for a new steam powerplant near Long Beach.

A Swiss firm bid $9,260,000. The lowest American bid was around $15 million. What is more, the American bid contained an escalation clause providing that the bidding price on the first turbine generator could be increased by 30 percent before delivery and the second by 40 percent. This was a hedge against inflation in the costs of materials and labor. The Swiss bid had no such escalation clause.

The Los Angeles board took the Swiss bid.

The same problem applies to hydroelectric turbines. There are five American companies in the field, and they are all consistently underbid by European and Japanese concerns. In several recent cases involving Government orders for turbines, the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization, acting in the name of national security under section 8 of the Trade Agreements Extension Act of 1958, has instructed the Army engineers to buy American, despite the higher costs.

Such decisions always provoke a storm of argument. The foreign firms who are thus shut out complain that the United States talks free trade but practices protectionism. On the other hand, if a foreign bid is accepted, as in the Los Angeles case, the critics from the other side of the fence say that the national security is threatened. In case of war, they claim, spare parts and maintenance problems could lead to power shutdowns.

Another national security argument—and perhaps a more valid one—holds that the Nation cannot allow its five producers of heavy turbine equipment to close up shop, which, they insist, is inevitable if they are forced to meet Japanese, Swiss, British and West German competition head-on.

It is a mistake to think that there is any easy answer to the problem. Naturally, it is to the interest of the free world, and of the United States, to promote free trade wherever possible. But many believers in free trade concede that heavy capital goods, such as steam and hydroelectric turbine plants, fall into a special category.

In many lines we can compete in the world market. Mass production techniques and labor-saving devices increase per capita output and make it possible for American firms to meet the challenge of the low-wage nations.

But things like turbines cannot be made on a production line. Each one has to be tailored separately, just like a battleship. The opportunity for automation and labor saving devices are very limited. With average hourly earnings in this country averaging more than twice those in Europe, it is obvious that our industries are fatally handicapped whenever they have to use the same number of man-hours as foreign firms do.

This country cannot, of course, embargo foreign manufactures indiscriminately, nor can it cut U.S. wages back to the Japanese level. Foreign imports, besides bringing many important products to our shores and providing our own industries with bracing competition, also are vital to the economies of our friends and allies abroad.

But when there are genuine considerations of national secuirty and defense—as opposed to purely political pressures and specious arguments—the OCDM has the power and the duty to step in.

DANIEL DECATUR EMMETT

Mr. LEVERING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVERING. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the introduction of my recent bill to honor Daniel Decatur Emmett, the composer of "Dixie," on the 100th anniversary of that composition, I have been heartened at the many expressions of support for my idea to authorize and direct the Postmaster General to issue a special commemorative stamp. Many, many of my colleagues have told me personally that they will support me in this request, and I am hopeful many more will do likewise.

I was interested, as I am sure my colleagues will be, to learn from the newspapers that Walter W. Williams, of Houston, Tex., the last living Civil War soldier, has requested to hear "Dixie" played once more before his death. Mr. Williams is 116 years old and is bedridden.

The Mount Vernon, Ohio, Sons of Veterans Fife and Drum Corps, in which I am proud to be a drummer, soon will make a record of "Dixie," and it will be flown to Houston so that Mr. Williams, who is believed to be on his deathbed, can have his wish fulfilled. Col. W. W.

Dorsey, of Mount Vernon, near which I live, is corps director, and I am happy that he acquiesced at once when the request for the "Dixie" record was made by the Williams family in behalf of the aged Civil War veteran.

Colonel Dorsey will be in Washington Saturday, April 18, 1959, in my office at 324 House Office Building. He is going to present me a copy of a colored photograph of the Sons of Veterans Fife and Drum Corps.

I believe that my colleagues join with me in welcoming Colonel Dorsey to Washington. It is my hope that they also will join with me in supporting my legislation to have the stamp printed in honor of Daniel Decatur Emmett and "Dixie." This request of the last Civil War veteran gives us some indication of what a terriffic indentation this song has had on America in the 100 years of its existence.

THE CHRISTIAN AMENDMENT HOUR

Mr. McINTIRE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

Mr. McINTIRE. Mr. Speaker, in conjunction with the Christian amendment resolution today introduced by me to the House of Representatives, I submit for insertion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD radio message No. 13, as delivered by the Reverend R. J. G. McKnight, D.D., Ph. D., in behalf of the Christian amendment movement:

"THE TYRANNY OF HUMAN GOVERNMENT APART FROM GOD"

(Radio message by Rev. R. J. G. McKnight, D.D., Ph. D.)

The discussions in this series of broadcasts have been designed to show that, in a nation that is predominantly Christian, the preamble to the Constitution should contain an acknowledgment of the sovereignty of God in all departments of life.

The doctrine of divine sovereignty is the basic concept in the Christian religion.

When a preamble begins: "We the people * * * do ordain and establish," it means nothing more than that it is the will of the people to do the things set forth as the objectives.

But the will of the people may change. For example, it was the will of the people at one time to abolish the liquor traffic. And that was done. A few years later it was the will of the same people to legalize the manufacture and sale of intoxicants. And that was done. It seems to be plain that the will of the people is a very insecure foundation upon which to establish the supreme law of the land. It was the will of the people that Christ should be crucified—"and so Pilate, willing to content the people, * * * delivered Jesus * * * to be crucified."

Surely there must be a standard of morals and an acknowledgment of an overarching authority, to which the will of the people must conform, if there is to be just and lasting government. In our preamble and in our Constitution there is no recognition of God or of the Bible, which contains the divine laws for men and nations.

In the brief time we have let us attempt to discover the danger that lies in such a government.

In the 13th chapter of the Revelation, we are given the picture of human government apart from God. It is a picture of a beast, rising out of the sea. The beast had seven heads; the beast had 10 horns; and on his horns 10 crowns, and on his heads the name of blasphemy. The beast was like a leopard, with feet as the feet of a bear. "His mouth was the mouth of a lion; and the dragon (Satan) gave him his power, and his seat, and great authority. And I saw one of his heads as it were wounded to death; and his deadly wound (death stroke) was healed; and all the world wondered after the beast. And they worshipped the dragon which gave power unto the beast; and they worshipped the beast, saying * * * Who is like unto the beast? who is able to make war with him? * * * And he opened his mouth in blasphemy against God, * * * His name, and His tabernacle. * * * And it was given unto him to make war with the saints, and to overcome them; and power was given him over all kindreds, and tongues, and nations."

That is human government apart from God. That is what it ultimately does.

In the picture the beast is sovereign: he has the emblems of authority. He also has the subtlety of the leopard; the ferocity of the bear; the fearlessness of a lion; and over all his heads the black flag of blasphemy.

It is a portrait of human government apart from God.

It is a picture of man in his self-sufficiency bowing God out of His universe.

John knew the history of the Old Testament. He knew the history of Assyria; the history of Babylon; the history of Medo-Persia; the history of Rome—how well he knew Rome that had banished him to Patmos. In every instance the results of government apart from God were the same: tyranny, intolerance, persecution, and over the whole stretch of human history he could write: semper eadem—always the same.

"But," you say, "that is history—and ancient history at that. That can't go on. Man makes progress in science; in the arts; in government. Man learns how to govern." You remind me that this is 1957 A.D.

But, my friends, it has gone on. It is going on today. Sometimes there is a lull: one of his heads is smitten with a death stroke. But the death wound was healed—and all the world wondered and admired the beast.

The meaning is plain—(1) Assyria suffered a death stroke. Yes, but it was healed immediately. And immediately (2) Babylon came up—the same spirit, same animus, the same mentality—there was no break in the continuity of the beast's dominion. Babylon goes down; (3) the next morning the Medo-Persian is on the throne. The Medo-Persian goes down; (4) Rome comes up. And still the dragon is in charge. Human sovereignty apart from God is something this sinful world adores and will not give it up.

Go back to that fateful day in the court of Pilate and read the record. (John 19: 14–15) And Pilate said unto them, "Shall I crucify your King;" And they answered, "We have no king but Caesar." There is the choice stated plainly. Humanity was offered Christ—King of kings and Lord of lords—and it chose Caesar. And ever since that day God has given unregenerate humanity Caesars. And how has humanity fared under Caesars?

In Eastern Europe today there is Russia, "the bear that walks like a man." Russia for centuries had its Caesar, its "Tzar" or "Czar"—(although "Tzar" or "Czar" was originally a title of Asiatic sovereigns.) But from "Ivan the Terrible"—1533 A.D.—whom the Polish poet has described as "the most finished tyrant known in history" down to the revolt against Czarism of this type, for five hundred years Russia was under the rule of the most frivolous, debauched and merciless rulers of history. Nicholas II was the last Czar.

Then came the revolution in Russia, and Stalin, with his selected corps of murderers, took over and settled in the Kremlin. A new regime. Any improvement? The world has witnessed in our day the ultimate in tyranny, persecution, intolerance and godlessness. (Rev. 13:6) And the beast "opened his mouth in blasphemy against God, to blaspheme His name, and His tabernacle, and them that dwell in heaven."

That is what happens when humanity cries out against the Lord of glory, the King of kings, and says, in so many words: 'We have no king but Caesar." Caesars, Czars, Kaisers—how the world adores totalitarian rulers.

And we see it again in Eastern Europe. The Hohenzollerns built an empire. The Kaiser (there is that name again) built the best political and military machine the world had ever seen. It was ready to operate in 1914. "Der Tag" came in August of that year. But the Reformation had brought Germany to a high position among the nations of Europe. The people believed in God. So the Kaiser had to walk softly. He gave God some recognition. But, as the events proved, the Kaiser ruled with an iron hand. His will was law. His philosophy was: "Ich und Gott."

In 1918 the Kaiser's regime came to an end. There came, as the Apostle John puts it, "a death stroke."

Then came Hitler with his crooked cross. Any improvement? Do we need to describe what the paperhanger dreamed and the depths to which "Der Fuehrer" led humanity?

My friends, a nation, our Nation, any nation without God is doomed. All history testifies to that. Humanity—without a revelation from God, without a friendly relationship to God—is a lost humanity. The problem of government is too great for human minds. Attempts to build a stable world order fail. They come short—and, coming short, they doom billions of men to war, famine, pestilence, and death. And the only alternative is to put our country in right relationship to Christ—the King of kings and Lord of lords. We need the counsel and the aid of the only wise God.

(Revelation 13:18) "Here is wisdom. Let him that hath understanding count the number of the beast: for it is the number of man, and his number is six hundred threescore and six." 666—never 7, which is perfection. Human sovereignty always comes short.

MEANS TO COUNTER A NEW CONCEPT OF WARFARE

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SIKES] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, I would like to associate myself with the ideas expressed in your address on the opening day of this session. I am sure every Member of this House agrees with you that we are living in the most dangerous period that civilization has gone through since Jesus walked the shores of Galilee 20 centuries ago. Dangerous and desperate situations require the utmost in human intelligence and effort to solve and allay.

I address myself today to one of these. The subject of psychological, political, and economic—that is, cold—warfare has become a major security issue. It needs to be dealt with more effectively than is now the case, including forthright congressional action. This new concept of war which we call "cold war" is generally dated by most people back to 1947 or 1948. This is a mistake. Actually Soviet political warfare against this country and the rest of the non-Communist world traces back to March 1919 when the Bolsheviks declared total and unrelenting war on us at the First Congress of the Communist International in Moscow.

At that time Lenin and his associates assured the bourgeois-capitalist world that its days were numbered, and that—

> The victory of proletarian revolution throughout the world is guaranteed. The formation of the International Soviet Republic is approaching [stormy applause].

Soviet conquest of the whole world thus became the pattern long before 1947.

Every subsequent Congress of the Communist International, every writing and speech by any Communist official anywhere, and every Soviet action since that historic declaration of war on the West, has reaffirmed and reiterated this Communist dedication to the total destruction of Western civilization.

This was brought out strikingly during the closing year of World War II. As you all will recall, Russia engaged in a number of puzzlingly unfriendly acts toward this country and our allies, long before the Nazis surrendered. There was the surly refusal to allow our heavily damaged planes after the Ploesti air raid to land on Soviet soil: the refusal to permit American fliers to take lend-lease planes into Russia: the instigation of a Communist mutiny in the Greek Navy at Alexandria, and the insistence that we abandon a loyal and hard-fighting ally, General Mihailovitch and the Chetniks in favor of Tito and his Communist partisans. The list could be extended.

We know that President Roosevelt, shortly before his death, was gravely worried over mounting evidence of Soviet bad faith, and that he had to dispatch a strongly worded protest to Stalin a day or so before he died. All of this occurred while Russia was still eagerly accepting the last of $11 billion worth of lend-lease munitions, supplies and food and anticipating more.

In reverse lend-lease the Soviets ordered their Communist Parties all over the world to resume their revolutionary and subversive activities against the governments of their allies, including ours. They repaid $11 billion of lend-lease with massive espionage, subversion, mutinies, and every conceivable form of political war, while we were both still fighting the Nazis. Had we understood this new type of warfare then, and perceived correctly just what Stalin was up to, we might not today be in our present predicament. We thought in terms of "peace" and "war" based solely on armed conflict. Our national leadership, in the main, failed to understand that warfare had passed into an entirely new and novel plane of action. Had we understood in 1946 just what cold war implied, we would not as readily have permitted China to fall into the Soviet power bloc. And had China not fallen into Red hands we would have been spared the loss of 53,000 American boys in Korea.

The Soviet cold war against this country has contributed to a cost to us of a total of about $70 billion in foreign aid; and combined with the Soviet military threat has caused us to spend some $200 billion in defense since the end of the Korean conflict in 1953. The total cost of the cold war since 1944 will probably exceed $350 billion—all out of American production and labor by way of taxes and resources. Now we have many well-informed people who assure us that the cold war will go on for many years, if not for several decades. The Soviets and Red China have convinced most of our people that they mean business, and that they have the will and ruthlessness to carry on indefinitely, whether we like it or not. That alone is a substantial victory in psychological warfare. It helps to precondition our negotiators into an attitude of defeatism and conciliation at the conference tables.

All of the staggering taxes, all of the burdens of compulsory military service and of military service overseas, all of the dislocation of our normal way of life would be cheerfully accepted, if we had certain evidence that we are winning the cold war. We could even take considerable satisfaction in the knowledge we had stopped Soviet advances and reached a stalemate where neither side could conceivably be sure of ultimate victory, if that were true.

The plain and unpalatable fact, of course, is that we have lost valuable ground. While we stare into space with fascination at sputniks and luniks—the Soviets continue to advance in the Middle East, Africa, and Latin America. In our concern over luniks, space platforms, the race to the moon, ICBM's and all the other latest death-dealing gadgets, we frequently lose sight of successful Soviet political warfare. Perhaps we should give this type of warfare a new name—fourth dimensional warfare—to include all forms of nonmilitary hostility carried on by psychological, economic, political, subversive, propaganda, diplomatic, and other means.

That an enemy nation can be softened, weakened internally, divided, and finally demoralized to a point where military resistance becomes useless, is now generally recognized. That such a trend must be resisted and met with positive countermeasures should be realized with equal certainty.

I contend that the problem of fourth dimensional warfare may be even more important to the survival of this Nation than the proper exploitation and control of atomic energy. President Eisenhower, speaking at Founders' Day ceremonies at Gettysburg College, close to his farm, warned Americans that they needed more understanding of the international facts of today's life.

The deliberations of the National Security Council and the Operations Coordinating Board are, of course, classified. Neither the American people nor Congress are kept advised of even the minor findings, opinions or contemplated guides of action. All of us can understand the necessity of secrecy in planning and operations of such importance. But, the very future and security of this Nation requires a coordinated, comprehensive effort of wide scope and general understanding; a program whose efforts are readily translatable to the public consciousness.

In 1955 General Sarnoff presented the administration with a blueprint for cold war strategy which would take the offensive out of the hands of the Communists and put them on the defensive. It was accepted by public acknowledgment, and given considerable publicity. That is the last we heard of the Sarnoff plan. It was presumably "studied" by some bureaucrat or bureaucrats, duly filed, and quickly forgotten. I use this as an example of official failure to stimulate public interest in this subject.

The Hungarian uprising of October 1956 caught both us and the Russians by surprise. After a few days of uncertainty and apparent beginning of withdrawal of Soviet forces from that heroic country, the U.S.S.R. struck with ruthless and brutal severity. Possibly the men in the Kremlin spotted the fumble on our side and realized we had no plan of action and were prepared to do exactly nothing, except file the usual routine and stilted diplomatic notes. In any event, the revolution cost the lives of 18,000 Hungarian freedom fighters, many of them mere children, and in the eyes of many people throughout the world, it exposed our cold war impotence and lack of prepared plans to take instant advantage of any cracks in the walls of the Kremlin prison house of nations.

Pure Marxism, the secret cause of Communist strength and inflexibility, states that the triumph of world communism is historically inevitable, and all of our best and strongest efforts will in the long run prove unavailing. If we accept this premise—and possibly there are powerful interests in America which secretly do so—then we are left with the alternatives of, first, fighting a rearguard action staving off the inevitable as long as possible and then capitulating; or second, buying time by appeasement and mollification; hoping that somehow world communism will collapse from within and the nightmare vanish of itself by some lucky miracle—the nature of which we cannot yet foresee or safely predict. This latter also skirts the position of containment subscribed to, I am sorry to say, by many of small faith and little intestinal fortitude.

I do not believe that the Soviets are 10 feet tall or that communism is invincible. I prefer to believe that our difficulties in the cold war stem not from Soviet superiority, but from ineptitude on our side or lack of positive effort. We have failed to use the right tactics, right weapons, right strategy or right leadership—or a combination of these.

I say that now is the time for Congress itself to inject new leadership into this problem and to examine every possible facet of the problem of why we are not winning the cold war. This does not mean any "agonizing reappraisal," but a cold-blooded, realistic, bipartisan study of fourth dimensional warfare as practiced by the Communists, as well as a relentless and thorough probing of all of our past policies, conceptions, and overall strategy. Now I know someone will rise to ask: "Why cannot all this be done by our Foreign Relations Committees or some other standing committee?"

The reply is obvious—new and critical problems require new and critical treatment. Present standing committees on both sides are already overburdened with work. But more important is the fact that cold war, or fourth dimensional warfare, is not entirely a matter of foreign policy, but cuts across several jurisdictions and, as I see it, transcends in importance the respective jurisdictions of existing committees.

With the opening of the atomic age in 1945, Congress realized that a revolutionary new era in science was opening. The Joint Committee on Atomic Energy was created to deal with an entirely new problem. Atomic energy could just as well have been assigned to some already established committee of the House and Senate. Congress wisely decided otherwise. The newly established Space Committee is further endorsement of this policy.

Such a joint committee, rather than infringing on established committee jurisdictions, would act as a coordinating clearinghouse between them on all matters relating to fourth dimensional warfare. As I envision its work, a great deal of the staff's time would be devoted to gathering and coordinating every available scrap of intelligence bearing on the cold war, and presenting it in readily accessible reports to Congress for its guidance and information. The world's acknowledged experts in various forms of political warfare would be heard in open or executive sessions as the national security and interest might determine. Such a joint committee holding hearings on cold war strategy would also dramatize in the public mind that this Congress is fully cognizant of the whole complex problem of cold war and is prepared to do something constructive about it.

TWENTIETH CENTURY TREK: OREGON TRAIL REVISITED

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PORTER] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, on April 19, the Oregon centennial wagon train embarks on a 2,000-mile trek from Independence, Mo. It is scheduled to reach Independence, Oreg., August 15.

This On to Oregon Cavalcade is part of Oregon's centennial festivities.

Former President Harry Truman recently told Senator RICHARD NEUBERGER and me that he would help start the wagon train on its journey. He will act as honorary trailmaster.

Six Conestoga wagons, made of sturdy oak, and constructed by Roy Brabham, of Eugene, Oreg., will comprise the wagon train. Gordon "Tex" Serpa, of Ashland, Oreg., is wagonmaster for this 130-day reenactment of the first blazing of the Oregon Trail. Conditions of the initial Oregon Trail journey will be followed as nearly as is possible, although the Indians will be friendly and scalping will be kept to a minimum. Twenty-five persons are scheduled to make the trip, I am told.

HONORING OREGON IS THE GOAL

This part of the Oregon centennial celebration is made possible through the efforts and work of many people. Some will work without any credit while others draw praise, but the goal of honoring Oregon is shared enthusiastically by all.

This covered wagon train caravan was initially brought to my attention the fall of 1957 by Mr. Alan Knudtson, of Roseburg, speaking for himself and others. A man of many ideas he and other friends had several years earlier helped stage a race between the Iron Horse and the real horse to point up a slowness in train service through a part of the Fourth Congressional District. The horse very nearly won.

In a letter dated April 12, 1958, Alan told me the centennial commission had given its support to his proposal for a wagon train retracing of the Oregon Trail.

The caravan boosters felt from the beginning that Harry Truman would be the ideal person to help "kick off" the train. He was an authority in the field of history. His home was in Independence, Mo., the starting point of the proposed journey. But first plans for the cross-country trip had to be more firm.

Each month the plans enlarged. The Roseburg Junior Chamber of Commerce worked hard on the program. It received the support of the State junior chamber. More than 70 junior chambers in Oregon were contacted. City and county governments were asked to sponsor wagons. The cost was estimated at $1,650 per wagon.

INTEREST HIGH—MONEY SCARCE

The nonprofit On to Oregon Cavalcade, Inc., working directly with the junior chambers, found many interested cities. They learned that it was not easy to find the financial support. The 1958 start would have to be postponed a year.

The South Lane Stamp Society of Cottage Grove secured a special postal permit for the trek. A special "Oregon Trail Trek" cover was printed. Mr. Ivan C. Hoyer, president of the Stamp Society, directed this phase of the operation.

By August 21, 1958, cavalcade plans were more firm. The group could think seriously of asking President Truman to officiate.

In Eugene, Roy Brabham was busy building three wagons as Christmas 1958 approached. In Independence, Mo., junior chamber of commerce members had been asked to think about plans for a kick-off celebration.

In a December 17, 1958, letter to my office, Knudtson wrote:

> I think the title for Mr. Truman, in the capacity of supreme dignitary of this event, should be "Oregon Centennial Honorary Trail Master."

He said letters had been written by then Gov. Robert Holmes to the Governors of the States through which the Oregon Trail passed and that each of them had sent best wishes and pledged cooperation and support. Bob Holmes' important role had started shortly after January 20, 1958, when I relayed Knudtson's request to him.

"DEAR MR. PRESIDENT—"

Slightly more than 1 year later, on February 20, 1959, Senator RICHARD L. NEUBERGER and I wrote a joint letter to Harry S. Truman at the request of the On to Oregon Cavalcade, Inc.:

FEBRUARY 20, 1959.

Hon. HARRY S. TRUMAN,
Truman Memorial Library,
Independence, Mo.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: It is our privilege to request that you be Honorary Trail Master for the Oregon Centennial Wagon Train which will leave Independence, Mo., the morning of Sunday, April 19, 1959.

A special celebration is planned in Independence the afternoon of Saturday, April 18. Oregonians who comprise the On to Oregon Cavalcade, Inc., hope your schedule will permit you to take part in the Saturday program; Sunday too, of course, if possible.

The dedication remarks would be of your own choosing. The six-member wagon train will follow as closely as possible the original Oregon Trail. Festive welcoming ceremonies are being arranged to greet the cavalcade at the end of the trail. The Wagon Train is a unique event planned during the 100th Oregon birthday celebration. We hope you will be able to help us observe the initiation of this 20th century trek.

We are told by those in charge of arrangements that State officials of Missouri, Kansas and Oregon are to be asked to participate in the sendoff. Congressional delegation members will also be invited to attend. Independence Junior Chamber of Commerce members are handling the activities in your city. Mr. Roger Bessmer is chairman. His home telephone number is Clifton 2-9148. His address is 3304 Morton Street.

On behalf of our State and the other members of the Oregon delegation we invite you to take part in our Centennial celebration. Your presence would bring great honor.

Sincerely,

RICHARD L. NEUBERGER,
U.S. Senator,
CHARLES O. POTTER,
Member of Congress.

Mr. Truman replied immediately. His response was a tentative "yes." He added:

> I doubt very much whether I'd be a good trail master, for I was informed by my grandfather that a trail master must be able to pop a 20-foot bullwhip and kill a fly without hurting the animal. I have never had any practice along that line, and I don't know whether I could do it; but if there is anything I can do to help make your start here in Independence agreeable and acceptable I'll be glad to do it.

The gist of his answer was sent to Mr. Richard Carter, of William Dawkins and Associates of Medford, Oreg., a public relations firm which had been hired to help coordinate and promote the wagon train. It was also sent to the hard-working Roseburg group.

On March 4, 1959, a second letter went out to Independence, Mo. The joint note from Senator NEUBERGER and myself provided Mr. Truman with some new details.

MARCH 4, 1959.

Hon. HARRY S. TRUMAN,
Truman Memorial Library,
Independence, Mo.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Orgonians everywhere join us in hoping that things will work out so that you can help start the Oregon Centennial Wagon Train when it leaves Independence.

Upon request, we advised the Oregon Centennial Commission of your desire to do all you can to help make the Wagon Train start in Independence pleasant and agreeable.

The Commission has been in contact with us almost daily. Today the Commission will announce that you have been invited to be Honorary Trail Master and that you hope things will work out so that you can be present when the cross-country trek starts.

Your immediate consideration of the invitation is certainly appreciated.

We see no reason to believe that you could not put the Trail Master's bullwhip to expert use. In 1948, for example, you were able to rid the United States of a number of pesky flies "without hurting the animal."

Sincerely,

RICHARD L. NEUBERGER,
U.S. Senator.
CHARLES O. PORTER,
Member of Congress.

THE CONFIRMATION

On March 9, 1959, former President Truman confirmed his tentative acceptance.

He wrote:

I have made arrangements with the Oregon Centennial Commission to be here (in Independence, Mo.) on April 18 * * * and I sincerely hope that I won't lose a point with that famous bull whip.

With Mr. Truman will be at least three Governors in the reviewing stand, I am told. They are George Dockins, of Kansas, Ralph Brooks, of Nebraska; and J. J. Hickey, of Wyoming. It is hoped that Oregon's Gov. Mark Hatfield will be present.

I have detailed the story behind the On to Oregon Calvacade because I believe it is in keeping with the vigor, creativity and remarkable perspicacity evidenced by the men and women who settled and built the West.

Under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I want to include an April 8, 1959 story from the Ashland (Oreg.) Tidings, which describes the route to be followed by the train; a March 9, 1959, news release from the Oregon Centennial exposition and International Trade Fair office; and a fine editorial by Forest Amsden, executive editor of the Coos Bay (Oreg.) World, entitled "Matching Oregon's Mountains."

Mr. Amsden discusses the men who came West to settle and build. As we await the Independence festivities this coming weekend, I think it is appropriate his observations be included:

WAGONS LED BY ASHLANDER READY TO START TREK

PORTLAND.—The crack of a bull whip, a cowboy yell and six lumbering Conestoga wagons will rumble onto the Oregon Trail and head for the Northwest.

This action April 19 will follow a brief ceremony at Independence, Mo., in which former President Truman will receive a lesson in bull whipping from a modern day wagon master, Gordon "Tex" Serpa, 39, Ashland, Oreg.

Amid cheers and good wishes 25 persons will man the wagons and start a 2,000-mile, 130-day reenactment of the Oregon Trail blazing.

The wagons will make up the "On to Oregon Cavalcade" in honor of the 100th birthday of Oregon.

Serpa will take charge with the same military-like authority that the pioneers found necessary.

"We expect many hardships on the trail," Serpa said. The travelers will work in pioneer fashion and eat and sleep in the wagons until they reach their destination, Independence, Oreg.

What dangers will the wagon train encounter? Indians? Coyotes? No. Traffic.

IN RUGGED TERRITORY

The Oregon Trail is now mostly scenic highway where scores of automobiles will whizz by the wagons.

There is some prairie country and old country roads that the wagons will have to negotiate. One stretch, between Independence Rock, Wyo., and Border, Wyo., a trip of some 18 days at their 20-mile per day pace, may show the modern wagon crews some hardships more familiar to the first pioneers.

The area, in part, is a dry, dusty, rocky and barely populated stretch of no man's land.

Water will be carried in canteens with little possibility of a quick refill. At night, as the wagons form a protective circle, the riders will go to the one modern spot of the caravan: A 40-foot semitruck that will follow with food. No chuck wagon. The victuals, however, will be prepared by the group.

To round out the repeat of western lore, a band of real Sioux Indians will "attack" the wagon train near Baynard, Nebr. After the scuffle, a peace pipe ceremony and a buffalo barbecue is scheduled for both whites and Indians.

The wagons, made of sturdy oak, and in the same fashion as they were 100 years ago, were constructed by one of the Northwest's few remaining wagoners, Roy Barbham, 60, Eugene, Oreg. The Oregon Centennial Commission, which allocated $25,000 for the trip, paid $1,650 each for the six wagons.

The trail covers the northwest corner of Missouri, the northeast corner of Kansas, straight through Wyoming and Idaho to Boise, and into Oregon.

When the train reaches The Dalles, Oreg., the wagons will forego the convenience of available modern highways and load onto barges for a trip on the Columbia River as far as possible. This is the way early settlers did it, according to existing records.

The caravan is due at Independence, August 15.

WAGONS WESTWARD

When an Oregon centennial wagon train rolls out of Independence, Mo., on April 19, on a 2,000-mile journey to the Beaver State, former President Harry S. Truman expects to be on hand to see that the caravan of prairie schooners gets a proper sendoff.

Senator RICHARD L. NEUBERGER, and Congressman CHARLES O. PORTER, of Oregon, made public in Washington Wednesday a letter from Mr. Truman in which he stated that, although he lacks experience as a bullwhip cracker, he will do all he can to help start the wagon train on its journey.

On behalf of Oregon centennial officials, Senator NEUBERGER and Congressman PORTER had requested Mr. Truman to act as honorary trail master for the wagon train.

VERY MUCH INTERESTED

"I am very much interested in that program," Mr. Truman replied, "I sincerely hope it will be possible for me to be present and help with the celebration.

"I doubt very much if I would be a good trail master," he continued. "I was informed by my grandfather that a trail master must be able to pop a 20-foot bullwhip and kill a fly without hurting the animal. I have never had any practice along that line, and I don't know whether I could do it.

"But if there is anything I can do to help make your start here in Independence agreeable and acceptable, I'll be glad to do it."

The 1959 crossing of the Oregon Trail by 30 men, women, and children is expected to focus national attention on centennial celebrations which are in progress throughout Oregon.

The year-long observance will be highlighted by the 100-day Oregon Centennial Exposition and International Trade Fair which opens in Portland on June 10.

TWENTY MILES A DAY

The wagon train, traveling 20 miles a day, is expected to take 130 days to reach Independence, Oreg. The venture is sponsored by the On to Oregon Cavalcade, Inc. The Oregon Centennial Commission has allocated $25,000 to help finance the trip.

Six covered wagons to be used on the trip have been built at Eugene by Roy Barbham. He is one of the few remaining wagon builders in the Pacific Northwest. Each of the wagons will cost $1,650. They will be taken to Independence, by the Union Pacific Railroad without charge.

Dick Smith, of Roseburg, Oreg., president of Oregon Calvacade, Inc., explained that the communities of Independence, Drain, Hillsboro, and Roseburg, and Lane County are sponsoring the wagons. Gordon (Tex) Serpa, Ashland, Oreg., rancher and movie stunt rider, will act as wagon master.

SEMITRAILER DONATED

Serpa explained that many civic and business organizations throughout Oregon are contributing to the wagon train fund. The Oregon trucking associations are donating a 40-foot semitrailer to carry supplies for the modern day pioneers.

Plymouth division of Chrysler Motor Co., has donated a 1959 station wagon for use as a cavalcade press car.

"We anticipate many hardships on the trail," the wagon master declared. "Our people intend as nearly as possible to emulate the pioneers who first made the trip by wagon train to Oregon. They will sleep in their wagons and cook in the open. Those who are making the trip have been carefully selected. They are prepared for a hard journey.

MATCHING OREGON'S MOUNTAINS

Men to match my mountains.
This, Oregon has had. She still does.

But this being the time to turn thoughts backward, we think of the Oregon men who matched her mountains long years past. They were the men, and women, who hewed a civilization out of a wilderness, a civilization founded on acquisitiveness but also born of a dream long dreamt by the American.

One hundred years is a very short time. But the way we measure years, it is a very long time.

The length of that span of years lends a romance to Oregon's pioneer days which the workaday citizens of those probably did not feel. Yet, they gave us Oregon as we know it today—Oregon with all its faults but more important, with all its virtues and its magnificent present and more magnificent future.

But the future is tomorrow. Today we think of the men and women who gave us the present.

We think of the tiny band of exhausted men, bearing a commission from a now legendary President of the United States, who struggled up rivers and over mountains for more than a year, nearly lost in the American vastness, in order to be the first of their race—and perhaps of any race—to traverse the continent within what would one day be the borders of the United States. RICHARD L. NEUBERGER, the noted Oregon author, has well said there was probably no excitement, no thrill of victory in the history of the Northwest to rival that felt by the men of Merriwether Lewis and William Clark when first they beheld the Pacific's waves breaking across the Columbia bar. How could there have been?

Yet it was only a moment of years after Lewis and Clark abandoned winter quarters at Fort Clatsop and headed back East to civilization before the first wave of immigrants arrived in the Oregon country. These first immigrants made Oregon American and set the stage for one of the most important and most dramatic mass migrations in human history.

There is scarcely an American alive unfamiliar with the Oregon Trail. The mere mention of it stirs up romantic visions of white-canvassed Conestogas lurching through a sea of grass, with rifle-across-arm outrider peeling an eye for hostiles. Generally, such visions do not contain the dust, the heat and sweat, nor the toil. For those who came over the trail, for the countless thousands in the countless thousand wagons, and on foot, some of them, those unromantic features were the only real things of that migration—the toil and sweat and misery, and yes—the dream of the good life to be earned by good work at journey's end.

"Oregon" had a tremendous meaning for those fathers of ours, both the ones who came and those who stayed behind. Oregon was the land of ever-shining mountains and ever-abundant fields, the expansive hope of an expansive land.

There were so many of those immigrants that today there are places in the parched midwestern plains where the ruts, worn deep into the earth by their wagons, are still pointed out to the curious, rubber-tired, air conditioned tourists of today.

Those ruts are sometimes created memorials, and interesting memorials at that. But they are nothing as memorials compared to Oregon itself.

The Civil War and statehood changed all that.

For every pioneer who came horseback, in a wagon, on a boat or who just trudged his way West, there were 100 or more who came on the railroad cars. But even so, these too were pioneers, for they came looking for opportunity and new land and work, and they found plenty of it.

They cleared the land and plowed it up and sowed it. They built roads, railroads and cities. They established logging camps and lumber mills. They fished, banked, baked and taught schools. They spread out eventually from the Williamette Valley Mecca, the original Oregon immigrant attraction, to all corners of the State and of Washington too, which was originally as "Oregon" as Oregon is today.

They were all kinds, these men and women of whom we think today. In the earliest days they were chiefly those shut out by the civilizing industrializing East and old West—that part of the "West" east of the Missouri River—but who still had the scratch to outfit for the long journey, or, lacking resources, set out without. The strong ones made it and they created a State.

Their journey was akin to going to the moon today, although the goal seemed more enticing. Today, when the continent is spanned in 5½ hours, it takes real effort to imagine how far it really was in those days between Independence, Mo., and the Trail's western terminus at The Dalles of the Columbia. Few of those who undertook and completed that trek had illusions about its distance, however. That's why they were a strong people. That is why they built a good country.

They are all gone now, those strong men and women and yet somehow they remain to remind us of a heritage they handed us unasked.

If history is recorded in order to improve the present and the future by example, the history of Oregon's pioneers gives an example of devotion and optimism and work by which we can best continue to build.

We are all pioneers.

None of us will ever traverse a dusty, dangerous Oregon Trail. But in the context of his own time each is tested by conditions, and those with the pioneer spirit will build well for the next 100 years.

Will it that each of us can as much match Oregon's mountains as those who went before.—F. W. A.

INFLATION: HOW TO AVOID IT AND STILL HAVE MAXIMUM EMPLOYMENT AND MAXIMUM PRODUCTION

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REUSS] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, there is growing concern over the perils of inflation in our economy. For example, the April 19 issue of This Week will report that in a poll of the editors of 40 leading newspapers "Control Inflation" was cited as the most urgent national problem by more editors than any other, followed by such issues as national defense and interracial relations. In a survey of 1,500 wage earners polled by MacFadden Publications, Inc., in answer to the question "What single subject do you think is most important for Congress to act on in the coming year?", more selected "Inflation" than any other subject, with unemployment the second most important subject.

So it is entirely appropriate for Congress to reexamine our institutional arrangements critically, and to ask whether they can meet the problem of inflation. Fortunately, the Subcommittee on Executive and Legislative Reorganization of the House Committee on Government Operations, under the able chairmanship of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DAWSON], has on March 25–26 and on April 9 held exhaustive hearings upon a number of bills on the subject of inflation, among them H.R. 4870, introduced by me, the Senate version of which, S. 1237, has been introduced by Senator JOSEPH S. CLARK, of Pennsylvania. The subcommittee on April 9 reported out the bill, with amendments. The text of H.R. 6263, the clean bill which incorporates the subcommittee's amendments, and which awaits the action of the full House Committee on Government Operations, follows:

TEXT OF H.R. 6263

A bill to amend the Employment Act of 1946 to provide for its more effective administration, and to bring to bear an informed public opinion upon price and wage increases which threaten economic stability

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Employment Act of 1946 (60 Stat. 23; 15 U.S.C. 1021 and the following), as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 6. It is the sense of Congress that the President and the Federal Government, in executing this Act, shall give due effect to the following provisions of the Act:

"(a) The provision of section 2 setting forth the goals of maximum employment, production (including the concept of sustained growth), and purchasing power (including the concept of reasonable price stability).

"(b) The provisions of section 3(a) requiring the President to include in each year's Economic Report, in quantitative terms, the levels of employment, production, and purchasing power which he deems 'maximum', and current and foreseable trends.

"(c) The provision of section 3(b) for the discretionary periodic transmittal of supplementary or revised recommendations.

"(d) The provisions of section 3(a)(3) for a review and of sections 3(a)(4) and 3(b) for programs and recommendations, including therein monetary and credit policies to the same extent as all other policies affecting employment, production, and purchasing power: Provided, That if the Federal Reserve Board disagrees with the monetary and credit policies included in such program and recommendations, the President in his report to the Congress shall include the Board's views and reasons."

SEC. 2. The Employment Act of 1946 is amended by adding a new section 7 as follows:

"SEC. 7. The President, directly or through any Federal agency he designates, shall hold public hearings concerning (a) price increases, prospective or actual, which in his judgment appears to threaten national economic stability, and (b) wage increases, prospective or actual, and the relationship of the price increases thereto, which the firm involved declares to be a cause of the price increases specified in clause (a) of this section. He shall issue factual summaries of such hearings, and, where he deems it advisable, issue advisory statements."

H.R. 6263 has two sections. Section 1 expresses the sense of Congress that the President and the Federal Government, in executing the Employment Act, should give due effect to certain specified provisions of the act. Section 2 empowers the President, directly or through any agency he designates, to hold public hearings for the purpose of bringing to bear an informed public opinion upon price increases, and associated wage increases, which threaten national economic stability.

SECTION 1—ADMINISTERING THE EMPLOYMENT ACT

The first section of H.R. 6263 underscores certain salutory provisions of the Employment Act of 1946 which have always been implicit in the act, but in recent years have been honored in the breach by the President and the Council of Economic Advisers. The provisions which it is desired to revivify are four:

REASONABLE PRICE STABILITY

First. The statutory goal of the Employment Act of "maximum purchasing power"—a goal coordinate with maximum employment and maximum production—has until very recently been universally considered to include the concept of reasonable price stability. The first two Chairmen of the Council of Economic Advisers—1947–52—Dr. Edwin G. Nourse and Mr. Leon H. Keyserling, have both testified that during their administration the words "maximum purchasing power" constituted a goal of maintaining reasonable price stability. However, within the past year, leading Administration figures, such as Council of Economic Advisers' Chairman Raymond J. Saulnier, Federal Reserve Board Chairman William M. Martin, and the President himself, have cast doubt that the Employment Act's language really does contain the mandate of reasonable price stability. So the first provision of section 1 explicitly includes the goal of "reasonable price stability" within the act's goals. At the same time, the definition of "maximum production," another of the act's goals, is clarified so as to include the concept of "sustained growth."

STATING QUANTITATIVE GOALS

Second. Section 3(a) of the Employment Act requires the President to include in his Economic Report the levels of employment, production and purchasing power which he deems "maximum," as well as their current and anticipated levels. This congressional mandate was faithfully adhered to by the Executive Branch during the period 1947–52. Since then, however, no serious effort has been made to estimate the levels of employment, production and purchasing power as they are likely to be in the upcoming year, or to project a goal of what they ought to be, in order to be consistent with the act's purposes. The second provision of section 1 of H.R. 6263 indicates that these goals and estimates should be given, in quantitative terms.

SUPPLEMENTARY REPORTS

Third. Section 3(b) of the Employment Act provides for the periodic transmittal of supplementary and revised recommendations, after the January annual economic report. Again, during the period 1947–52, the Executive Branch found it desirable each year to issue a supplementary report in mid-passage. Since 1952, however, the Council of Economic Advisers is heard from in January, but then is heard no more by the Congress. Congress, for example, could be greatly assisted right now by the filing of a supplementary report by the Council of Economic Advisers, in the format prescribed by the Employment Act, with the Joint Economic Committee. Ironically, Chairman Raymond J. Saulnier of the Council of Economic Advisers has a lengthy interview in this week's—April 20—issue of U.S. News & World Report—pages 54 to 61—in which he submits to an across-the-board set of questions on the economic situation ahead of us. If the Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers can do this for U.S. News, why cannot he do it for the U.S. Congress? The third provision of section 1 hints gently that Congress would like to see this done.

MONETARY AND CREDIT RECOMMENDATIONS

Fourth. The fourth of the 4 provisions of section 1 requires the President to include, both in his review and his recommendations, monetary and credit policies to the same extent as all other economic policies affecting employment, production, and purchasing power. Again, from 1947 to 1952 the Economic Report presented to the Congress and the Nation a truly comprehensive and coordinated economic program which took account of all Federal economic policies, including monetary, and credit policies. The Federal Reserve System, being independent of the Executive, was of course free to disregard such of these policies as it disagreed with. Since 1953, however, the Administration has left monetary and credit policies out of its calculations entirely. As Chairman Saulnier of the CEA testified concerning the 1958 Economic Report:

> In the Economic Report we have expressed no judgments as to the adequacy or inadequacy of credit policy. (Joint Economic Committee hearings on January, 1958, Economic Report of the President, p. 29.)

The January 1959 Economic Report of the President merely states:

> "Responsibility for monetary and credit policies rests with the Federal Reserve authorities which have independent status within the Government" (p. 52).

DR. GERHARD COLM'S TESTIMONY

Dr. Gerhard Colm, Chief Economist of the National Planning Association, in his testimony on April 9 before the Dawson subcommittee, summarized very clearly the need for the four clarifying amendments contained in section 1 of H.R. 6263:

In the first group of interpretive amendments, maximum employment and production is defined so as to include the concept of sustained growth; maximum purchasing power is defined so as to include the concept of reasonable price stability. In my opinion, there cannot be any real question about the validity of these interpretations in the light of the legislative history of the act.

A second interpretive amendment requires the President's economic report to include statements in quantitative terms, of the levels of employment, production, and purchasing power needed to meet the objectives of the act. A review of the debate on the full employment bill of 1945 both by the committees of Congress and by the Congress itself shows that this is the meaning of the legislation as enacted. The Joint Economic Committee has interpreted the act in this way and has provided quantitative statements of the needed levels when the executive branch failed to do so.

As to the third interpretive amendment the Employment Act left it to the discretion of the President to decide when changes in the economic situation called for supplementary reports and revised recommendations. But it was certainly the intent of these provisions that supplementary reports should be prepared in the event of a significant change in economic conditions. For example the Economic Report of January 1958 did not recognize the severity of the recession then underway. Not long thereafter, however, the President found it necessary to recommend and adopt measures in order to counteract the recession. In my opinion this situation warranted a supplementary economic report.

Finally, I also have no doubt that the intent of the Employment Act was to include a review of and recommendations for monetary and credit policies as part of the President's report on national economic policy. As a matter of fact, the first version of the full employment bill of 1945 was criticized because of an overemphasis on Government expenditures as an anticyclical device and a neglect of other devices, particularly monetary policies. The revision in the original language was intended to cover all policies which could affect employment, production, and purchasing power within the specified limitation of the act.

Since the interpretation of the Employment Act has been questioned in these four respects, it would in my opinion be desirable for the Congress to go on record with a clarification of the act.

SECTION 2—FOCUSING PUBLIC ATTENTION ON PRICE-WAGE INCREASES

Section 2 of H.R. 6263 directs the President, directly or through any agency he designates, to hold public hearings in order to focus an informed public opinion on price increases, and associated wage increases, "which appear to threaten national economic stability." The "national economic stability", it is clear from the testimony before the Dawson subcommittee, could be threatened by increases in those concentrated industries which tend to set the pace for the entire economy.

Section 2 contains no sanctions. But the mere fact of holding public hearings would give the public the opportunity to get the true facts concerning the justification for the proposed increases. The President, it is true, is empowered, if he wishes, to issue an advisory statement. But this need not be done, and certainly should not be done, until he has been able to evolve sound criteria for such a judgment. Even though no advisory statement is issued, the public character of the hearing would tend to make both management and labor more aware of the public interest in price stability.

DR. GARDNER MEANS' VIEWS

The kind of inflation which originates in the concentrated sector of the economy, even when there is a deficiency of general demand, and is hence not effectively controllable by monetary and fiscal policies, was well described by Dr. Gardner Means, Consulting Economist, in his testimony before the Dawson subcommittee on March 25:

The great bulk of the wholesale price inflation—from 1953 to 1958—was in the concentrated industries. Steel alone accounted for nearly a quarter of the rise in the index and the steel and steel using industries accounted for two-thirds of the rise. Each of the administration dominated groups rose substantially. In contrast, the market dominated groups rose substantially. In contrast, the market dominated groups rose little or actually fell in the same period. This is what is meant by an administrative inflation.

Now this type of inflation is in complete contrast with the classical type of inflation such as we had after World War II and in the Korean war. Those inflations were demand inflations in which there was too much money chasing too few goods. As a result of the excess demand, market dominated prices rose first and most while administration dominated price lagged behind. Then, when there was no longer too much money chasing too few goods, market dominated prices dropped back and administration dominated prices continued to rise until a new balance of prices had been established.

The importance of this distinction lies in the fact, now coming to be widely accepted, that while a tight money policy may be able to control a demand inflation, it cannot control an administrative inflation. It has become clear that limiting demand by a tight money policy can create depression and unemployment but administrative inflation continues. Thus, the steel industry last summer raised its prices 3 percent in spite of the fact that its operations were down to 60 percent of capacity and in spite of the great price increases that had already occurred since 1953.

For the immediate problem of achieving full employment without serious administrative inflation, I regard public price hearings and publication of the facts as having an important role to play. I would be very strongly against the adoption of price and wage controls except as a distant and last resort when other measures had failed. But public hearings on prospective or actual price increases—and where necessary wage increases—could serve a very useful purpose where there was serious danger that such increases would threaten the stability of the economy and impede economic recovery. I would not contemplate a large number of hearings in any one year, but I would expect that the relevant data on costs, wages, productivity, and so forth, would allow the public to distinguish between legitimate and nonlegitimate price increases and bring home to those in control in the concentrated industries the policies which would represent responsible behavior toward economic recovery.

GALBRAITH'S TESTIMONY

Prof. John Kenneth Galbraith of Harvard University, in endorsing the price-wage hearings proposal before the subcommittee on March 25, had this to say:

> Now, it will be plain, I think, Mr. Chairman, that if the cause of the inflation is not an excess of demand, then it cannot be remedied by either monetary policy or fiscal policy, the purpose of which is to cut down demand. This seems to me to be the essential ambiguity and error in the present policy of the Government, of the administration.
> Although the Federal Reserve authorities have tended to accept administered prices as the cause of the inflation, the remedies have continued to be the cutting back of demand, and we should remind ourselves that when you cut back on demand, you also have the effect of increasing unemployment. This is what a reduction in demand for goods does, and you have some reduction in the rate of growth in the economy, because it is when the economy is pressing on its capacity that firms add to their capacity. When they have idle capacity, they don't feel similarly obliged.
> This means that the monetary and fiscal policies largely bypass the problem of the kind of inflation that we have, and by contributing to unemployment and by slowing the rate of growth, we have other effects which we don't want.

Dr. Colm, in his testimony before the subcommittee on April 9, shows the relevance of the price-wage hearings procedure if we are to insure both economic growth and price stability:

> One of the most important tasks of economic policy is to reconcile the principal objectives of the Employment Act, namely the promotion of economic growth and of reasonable price stability under full employment conditions. The legislative proposal before you merits your serious consideration because it comes to grips with this task.

Until a few years ago, some economists still denied that there really are two kinds of inflation. The experience of the recession has demonstrated beyond doubt that in the modern economy prices can rise even when there is a slack in demand. In such a situation the use of monetary policy to combat the price rise would aggravate the slack in demand. That is what actually happened in the fall of 1957.

The price rise in 1957 and 1958 should not have been combated by monetary policy; it should have been combated by other means. A procedure such as that proposed in the bill under consideration could have been of great usefulness in that situation. Not all situations will be so clear cut as that of 1957–58. Often both types of inflation occur at the same time so that several anti-inflation policies will have to be used in combination.

ADMINISTRATIONS ARE INSUFFICIENT

In the face of demand inflation, policies would be needed which curtail demand and/or increase supply. Appeals for self-restraint in buying can at best hold back the price rise only temporarily. A cost-push or administered price inflation, however, requires a variety of other measures. A cost-push or administered price inflation can be mitigated in the longer run by policies which promote competition. However, in the structure of modern business and labor completely competitive conditions cannot be achieved. Neither prices nor wages are wholly determined by the forces of supply and demand. There remains a considerable margin within which prices and wages are determined by deliberate decisions of business managers and the partners in collective barbaining. These deliberate decisions may or may not be most conducive to economic growth and price stability. The question then is how can a policy be achieved which at the same time does justice to the long-range interests of the parties concerned and takes into consideration the national interests of long-term growth and reasonable price stability? Such reconciliation of private and public interests can be achieved if the parties exercise some degree of self-restraint.

As I understand it this proposal does not intend to adopt price or wage controls. Rather, it is designed to put some teeth into the "jawbone" approach to the promotion of self-restraint. The President under this proposal could order that hearings be held on actual or prospective price increase and such wage increases which the firm involved declares would necessitate price increases. The knowledge that hearings may be held and that summary conclusions and advisory statements may be issued would, I believe, add to the self-restraint of both management and labor.

I am aware of the fact that some business organizations and some labor organizations have objected to the proposal. Some people have expressed concern that the holding of hearings on price and wage changes might be only the first step to imposing price and wage controls. They fear that it might serve as the notorious nose of the camel getting into the private business tent. While I do not see that price and wage controls should be a consequence of this proposal, I too believe that no additional measure of Government intervention in the private sphere should be adopted unless the alternatives are even less desirable.

What then are the alternatives? Let me first say that the threat of an imminent runaway inflation is not why I favor this proposal. As a matter of fact, I believe that some of the fears which have been expressed by people inside and outside the Government are grossly exaggerated. In the long-term perspective the recent price increases in the United States have been relatively mild, if we exclude the periods of war and the aftermath of war. I am concerned, however, with the persistency of small price rises, particularly in periods of slack demand. If the Government officially adopts a policy of looking in the other direction whenever prices rise, business, labor, consumers, and investors may anticipate a continuing price rise with the consequence that a small price rise would soon become an inflation spiral.

The use of conventional methods, such as a restrictive monetary policy, to fight such price rises may interfere with the objective of achieving a desirable rate of economic growth. Economic stagnation could result if not economic recession or depressions.

Some may say that since the situation is not yet alarming, we might as well wait until the problem becomes really urgent. My answer is that at this point we may be able to achieve reasonable price stability with mild measures and avoid the necessity of price and wage controls. If the public gets the impression that the Government is not really serious about keeping prices in line, then the speculative anticipation of further price rises may magnify the problem; in the end this might lead to the necessity of price and wage controls. Thus, it may well be that a proposal such as the one before this committee may be regarded as a measure avoiding rather than leading to price and wage controls. The amendment proposed in H.R. 4870 with proper implementation would in my opinion demonstrate that the Government is concerned with price stability and would thereby have a considerable effect on the behavior of all concerned without necessitating direct controls.

OPPOSITION IS FORMIDABLE

I wish I could report, Mr. Speaker, that practically everybody favors my bill. Actually, I have to admit that almost everybody important is against it. The administration opposes it. The Federal Reserve is against it. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce is against it. The AFL–CIO is against it.

Bernard D. Nossiter, the perceptive economic columnist of the Washington Post, commented upon this in the March 31 issue:

ECONOMIC BLOOMS—STRANGE ALLIANCES SPROUT ON HILL

(By Bernard D. Nossiter)

This is the time of the year when the soft spring mood of love creeps into the strangest quarters. It has inspired the unlikeliest economic and political combinations on Capitol Hill.

Here are two pairs inspired by the great economic debate over what to do about rising prices, high unemployment, and slow economic growth:

1. Last week both the AFL–CIO and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce opposed the same bill in testimony before the House Government Operations Committee. The two big interest groups agreed that the measure in question would be a mistake. This bill would require big industry or big labor to tell a Government body why specific prices and specific wages should be raised.

2. Yesterday some shrewd Hill sources predicted that at least the Democratic majority of the Government Operations Committee would report out just such a bill—one embodying the notification feature of the measure sponsored by Representative HENRY REUSS, Democrat, of Wisconsin, and Senator JOSEPH CLARK, Democrat, of Pennsylvania. And on Thursday, Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, Republican, of Wisconsin, said President Eisenhower correctly recognized that the consumer has a very direct stake in the steel industry's wage-price talks. Moreover, WILEY's remarks were publicized in a statement written by the staff of the Senate minority policy committee.

All this is not spring madness. The big unions and the big corporations, according to some testimony, have a vested interest in rising wages and profit-breeding rising prices. Then both Republicans and Democrats have a vested interest in getting elected, and there are more consumers than there are labor or business leaders.

Hill cynics point out that it is folly to pass any bill opposed by organized business and organized labor. These groups, they say, are articulate and organized. Consumers, of course, are not. However, Hill professionals say that some consumers are writing letters—the pensioners, Government workers, professionals and white-collar workers, groups that have unorganized votes.

Despite the moves toward superunity among labor and business on the crucial matters, there are differences in style.

The chamber is strident. It said this of the Reuss-Clark price-wage notification provision:

"To transfer individual price-wage decisions from impersonal markets to the political arena would signal the end of consumer sovereignty and economic freedom."

The AFL–CIO is subtle. It said this:

"We think this proposal needs more study * * * there are no sanctions in (the) bill. We are not certain how effective such a public hearing procedure could be in the absence of sanctions. We question whether the introduction of wages as a separate issue into such a procedure for public hearings serves any useful purpose."

So, in another subtle thrust, AFL–CIO proposed that the question be studied by the Joint Economic Committee, whose investigation into price-jobs-growth has just started. Interestingly enough, in this committee's first round of hearings it heard from four distinguished witnesses. But unlike the Government Operations Committee, covering the same ground, the Joint Economic Committee had no time, as yet at least, for any of the many economists who favor the Reuss-Clark idea.

All of which probably goes to prove that the course of true love, even in the spring, doesn't always run smoothly.

The Washington Post has summed up the case for the price-wage hearings provision very well in two recent editorials:

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 27, 1959]

THE PRESIDENT ON STEEL

President Eisenhower has followed his economic advisers—and those of the Federal Reserve Board—into vigorous battle on the price issue. In the most forthright and forceful statement he has yet made on the subject, the President has asserted the public interest in the forthcoming steel wage talks, urging both the companies and the unions to forego any steps that might lead to another round of price increases. This is the first time that the President has addressed himself so boldly to a specific inflationary threat arising from the ability of the concentrated industries, like steel, to defy the normal laws of supply and demand. In view of general expectations of another difficult bargaining session and fears of a protracted strike—despite the fact that the steel industry is operating far below capacity—Mr. Eisenhower's warnings are most timely.

A chief difficulty, of course, is that labor and management will interpret the President differently. Wisely the President has not ruled out all concessions to the unions; the general administration view reportedly is that modest wage and other improvements could be absorbed out of the relatively high current earnings of the industry. This of course leaves open to dispute how much the unions can insist upon and still heed the President's injunction. Management, on the other hand, advised against any price increase, undoubtedly will insist that this means no wage improvement either.

Mr. Eisenhower's plea for restraint would be notably reinforced, we believe, if there were some kind of machinery to investigate and state the public case in more detail. For example, there is a wide gulf between union and management claims on how the rates of wage and profit increases in recent years compare, each side arguing that it is being shortchanged. For our part, we are persuaded that earnings have outdistanced wages by quite a margin—but a public, impartial finding on this and other factual aspects of the situation would be most helpful.

It is difficult to understand, therefore, why some administration spokesmen are so cool toward the proposals of Senator CLARK, Representative REUSS and others that would enable the public to get the facts. Perhaps something short of a full-fledged, adversary-type proceeding would suffice, but clearly even the sternest presidential warnings would avail more if set against a detailed factual background. Congress could usefully buttress the President's strong stand on this important question by setting up an appropriate factfinding mechanism.

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 3, 1959]

WHAT OF THE CONSUMER?

It ought to come as no great surprise, we suppose, that spokesmen for both "big labor" and "big business" are opposed to proposals for a Government review of price-wage changes that might have a significant inflationary impact. The fact that neither group wants such a review might in a sense be taken as prima facie evidence of the need for it. In too many wage negotiations since World War II it has appeared that management's attitude was too "easy" and labor's too demanding in relation to normal market and price considerations, each side apparently feeling that the consumer could be stuck for the bill, or most of it, whether he liked it or not. This, at least, has seemed the case in the concentrated industries like steel where prices have spiraled almost steadily despite marked periodic declines in demand.

The difficulties with outright price-wage control are of course so great that only in a war or other extreme emergency should such measures be undertaken. Similarly, extensive Government involvement even in a review and factfinding procedure, relying upon public opinion for "enforcement," would have its pitfalls. Full adversary proceedings, with all the paraphernalia of a "record," of hearings, evidence and cross-examination, might seriously subvert the necessary private bargaining process and also introduce delays that could make the economy sluggish and less responsive to public demands than it sometimes is.

But a limited, public "sampling" of the factors in major wage and price decisions, undertaken as and if needed by a nonpartisan, expert board whose findings could be expeditiously developed and published, might serve a most useful purpose. Whatever such a board might say, labor or management or both would be free to dispute it and to act as each might see fit. But the confused public, unable to reconcile the widely divergent claims of both sides in major contract disputes and important price adjustments, would at least have an independent source of information. In time, a competent factfinding procedure of this kind could come to have a stabilizing effect on both business and labor leadership. The decisions would still lie with the companies and the unions, but a greater capacity to judge their wisdom would become the public's. The consumer might then make his voice heard at the bargaining tables.

UNJUSTIFIABLE RESTRICTIONS ON INFORMATION CONTROLLED BY THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. MOSS] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. Speaker, twice—last Friday and yesterday—the Honorable CLARE HOFFMAN, of Michigan, inaccurately attacked the work which the Special Subcommittee on Government Information is doing to remove unjustifiable restrictions on information controlled by the executive branch and he impugned my motives as chairman of the subcommittee. I now wish to clarify the facts which were so badly twisted by my distinguished colleague from Michigan—facts to which he had ready access as the minority member of the subcommittee.

First, Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment on a most interesting coincidence. The tenor of the attack by the minority member of the subcommittee, Mr. HOFFMAN, is identical to the tenor of a similarly baseless charge by Mr. Robert Dechert, General Counsel of the Department of Defense. The date of Mr. HOFFMAN'S first attack on the floor of the House of Representatives, April 10, and the date of Mr. Dechert's letter attacking the subcommittee are identical. And both attacks make the same errors.

Mr. Speaker, I would not dream of charging that there was any sort of collusion between these two respected gentlemen. I would never contend that the Republican member of the subcommittee was influenced to make his attack by the Republican General Counsel of the Department of Defense. But both gentlemen contend that the subcommittee's inquiry into the fouled-up security system in the Pentagon benefits the Communists. And both gentlemen—highly intelligent, I am sure; extremely patriotic, I am certain, and well informed if they wished to be—overlook the fact that disrespect in the Pentagon for the information security system is generated by the excessive abuses of the system.

Also, I am somewhat surprised to find two such distinguished and honorable gentlemen adopting the Communist scare technique—a political technique discredited because it has been used so often by those whose arguments are weak and, therefore, they find it more expedient to impugn the motives of those they attack.

Mr. Speaker, I can best answer Mr. HOFFMAN'S attack on the subcommittee's work by putting in this public RECORD the same letter which I sent yesterday to the Secretary of Defense in response to the wholly unwarranted and erroneous charges of Mr. Dechert. In summary, the facts set forth in the letters are these:

On March 30, 1959, the subcommittee asked Secretary of Defense Neil H. McElroy for an explanation of the apparent on-again-off-again secrecy about the use of monkeys in research projects. The subcommittee also asked for an explanation of how the disclosure that monkeys are used in scientific satellites could prejudice the defense interests of the Nation.

On April 10, 1959, Mr. Dechert leveled his attack on the subcommittee, charging that information concerning classified matters has been disclosed by an employee of the Department of Defense, without authority. Mr. Dechert, backed up yesterday by Mr. HOFFMAN, demanded full details on the source of the subcommittee's information which led to the inquiry.

The subcommittee is most happy, in a spirit of cooperation—not, I emphasize in response to Mr. Dechert's demand, but in a spirit of full cooperation—to provide the details of its investigation. The subcommittee's answer to Mr. Dechert's letter, delivered to Secretary McElroy yesterday, provides this information which is, in summary:

First. The initial subcommittee source was a U.S. Air Force official announcement—Washington Post, December 4, 1958—which was expanded by Department of Defense Press Release No. 1230–58—December 3, 1958.

Second. This official information on the use of monkeys in satellites and other scientific research projects was enlarged upon at a public press conference by Mr. Roy W. Johnson, Director of the Department's Advanced Research Projects Agency—December 3, 1958.

Third. Another source of information was a 2-page article written for Life magazine—January 5, 1959—by the Director of the Astronautics Division of the U.S. Navy's Bureau of Ships. This article included pictures and extensive details on space flights of monkeys.

Fourth. When reporters asked information officials at the Wright Air Development Center near Dayton, Ohio, whether monkeys were being readied for space flights, the information officials checked with the Pentagon and were told to keep their mouths shut—December 5, 1958.

Fifth. The New York Times later reported that there was a clampdown on mentioning monkeys in space "because there are some people in this world who get as emotional about monkeys as Americans get about dogs"—December 8, 1958.

Sixth. A Pentagon information official informed the subcommittee of the existence of Assistant Secretary Snyder's classified monkey memorandum—a fact which is not secret since Mr. Dechert has disclosed even the contents of the classified memorandum.

Seventh. In an attempt to clarify this on-again-off-again secrecy which sometimes prohibited even the mention of the word "monkey" and other times permitted Pentagon publicity experts to hippodrome monkey research, the subcommittee telephoned public, nonmilitary research personnel. These contacts included the National Advisory Committee for Rhesus Monkey Requirements, a function of the National Research Council with offices at the National Institutes of Health.

Eighth. Other similar nonmilitary, unclassified sources on the problems of obtaining monkeys for scientific research are the Parke, Davis & Co. laboratory in Detroit, the Eli Lilly & Co. laboratory in Indianapolis, and other pharmaceutical laboratory officials who have discussed the problem with Mr. S. G. Ramachandran, commercial secretary of the Indian Embassy.

Ninth. From such public sources, it can be determined that there was a ban on the shipment of research monkeys from India from February 1958 to June 1958. The ban was imposed after animal protection organizations in the United States and in India—where there is a cult of monkey worshippers—complained to the Indian Government. The ban was lifted after officials of the Indian Government conferred on the humane treatment of research monkeys with representatives of the National Advisory Committee for Rhesus Monkey Requirements. Representatives of the State and Commerce Departments also participated in the meetings.

Mr. Speaker, now that the distinguished gentleman from Michigan and the General Counsel of the Defense Department from Philadelphia have the facts—facts, incidentally, which can be collected by anyone who can read a newspaper and use a telephone directory—I hope they will help me pursue the subcommittee's original request, to quote from the letter of March 30, 1959, for a full explanation of the apparent on-again-off-again secrecy about the use of monkeys in research projects.

If the military security of the United States justifies any control of this type of information, that control should have followed a consistent pattern instead of the highly contradictory pattern detailed by the subcommittee's records.

It might be interesting, Mr. Speaker, to know that out at the Washington Zoo is a cage containing a Macaque monkey, and on the cage is a plaque which reports that this is one of two monkeys sent up in 1952 in an Air Force Aerobee rocket to a height of 200,000 feet into the upper atmosphere from New Mexico. He was subjected to 15 G's pressure on takeoff. He is a gift of Air Research and Development Command, November 1953.

Mr. Speaker, as I stated at the beginning, I have been attacked both by my distinguished colleague [Mr. HOFFMAN] and by a letter from the General Counsel of the Department of Defense. My motives have been impugned. I have been accused of following a pattern which would give aid and comfort to the Communists.

I submit that the ridiculous pattern being pursued by the Defense Department in the hopelessly impossible task of classifying the unclassifiable does far more damage than any policy of open aboveboardness which I have adocated.

I have never advocated, and the gentleman from Michigan has repeatedly heard me reaffirm this in the hearings of the subcommittee, anything but the most stringent security over information which could in any way affect adversely the security of the United States.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOSS. I am very happy to yield to my distinguished colleague from Florida.

Mr. FASCELL. I gather from the gentleman's statement that the charge has been made that the Subcommittee on Information either sought classified information or declassified information which hitherto had been classified. I am satisfied from the gentleman's statement here of the fact that the information had already been made public long before this issue ever arose. Is that correct? Is that the gentleman's position?

Mr. MOSS. That is the position I have taken. I think the record bears me out.

Mr. FASCELL. As a member of the subcommitee, it has been my understanding that this subcommittee has followed a policy that we have never sought classified information of any kind. Is my understanding correct and is that still the policy of the subcommittee?

Mr. MOSS. That is the policy of the subcommittee.

Mr. FASCELL. Will the gentleman agree with me that the records of this subcommittee in hearings that have been held over many years bear ample proof of the complaints that have been made that there is overclassification of matters which have nothing to do with national defense?

Mr. MOSS. The record will bear it out, and I quoted in my letter yesterday to Secretary McElroy a statement from the Coolidge committee which was appointed by former Secretary of Defense Charles Wilson for the study of this matter. That committee in reporting to us in public hearings made this statement referring to overclassification:

The result is not only that the system fails to supply to the public information which its proper operation would supply, but the system has become so overloaded that proper protection of information which should be protected has suffered. The press regards the stamp of classification with feelings which vary from indifference to active contempt. Within the Department of Defense itself the mass of classified papers has inevitably resulted in a casual attitude toward classified information, at least on the part of many.

That committee was chairmanned by Mr. Charles Coolidge, a distinguished former Assistant Secretary of Defense, and four flag officers of the military services served with him.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MOSS. I am very pleased to yield further to the gentleman.

Mr. FASCELL. It has been my understanding the gentleman's position is that there has been a great mass of information which is properly classifiable under the President's Executive order in the national interest.

Mr. MOSS. That is correct.

Mr. FASCELL. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MOSS. I am very happy to yield further to the gentleman.

Mr. FASCELL. Does the gentleman agree with me that the great bulk of the investigations which have come about in this subcommittee have resulted naturally, because of the fact that the greatest classification of matters originates within the Defense Department?

Mr. MOSS. That is also correct.

Mr. FASCELL. And it would seem to be at this point they are getting overly sensitive about the whole situation?

Mr. MOSS. I would conclude from this most recent exchange that they are almost dedicated to making it so uncomfortable for those of us on the subcommittee that we will back away from probing their irresponsible actions. And I want to serve notice on them that that I have no intention of doing.

Mr. FASCELL. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MOSS. I yield further to the gentleman.

Mr. FASCELL. I certainly concur with the gentleman. I regret that the Department of Defense has used this issue to make unwarranted charges and impugn the motives of the chairman, because it has been my observation in serving with the gentleman on this subcommittee that he has made a remarkable record and has rendered a great public service to the people of this country in fighting for information which should be made available to the American people.

Mr. MOSS. I thank my colleague for his support. I wish to include in the RECORD the published sources of information to which I referred earlier.

The Washington Post and Times Herald, page A20, December 4, 1958:

The initial launchings will be made primarily to test the vehicle itself, especially its propulsion and guidance. Later satellites will contain biomedical specimens to seek data on environmental conditions which will be useful to the man-in-space program being carried out jointly by ARPA and the National Aeronautics and Space Administration. As part of this program, live animals, including primates, will be carried aloft and their recovery attempted.

The Air Force announced a few days ago that it was readying test animals for space flights, the animals ranging from mice to monkeys large enough to put in a 2-quart jar.

The news release from the Department of Defense, Office of Public Information, Washington, D.C., December 3, 1958:

"PROJECT DISCOVERER" SATELLITE PROGRAM ANNOUNCED BY DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

The first attempt to launch a satellite over the Pacific Missile Range will be made late this year or early next year from Vandenberg Air Force Base, Calif., the Department of Defense announced today. This launching will be part of a series—designated "Project Discoverer"—to be carried out by the Department of the Air Force under the direction of the Defense Department's Advanced Research Projects Agency.

The purpose of ARPA's Project Discoverer is to continue development of a number of systems and techniques which will be employed in the operation of space vehicles. Although no precise number of launchings has been scheduled for the project, it is expected a considerable number will be attempted because of the nature and variety of the experiments involved and the fact that the satellites will orbit only for short periods of time.

The initial launching primarily will be to test the vehicle itself, especially its propulsion and guidance. Later, the satellites will contain biomedical specimens to seek data on environmental conditions which will be useful to the man-in-space program being carried out jointly by ARPA and the National Aeronautics and Space Administration. As part of this program, live animals also will be carried aloft and their recovery attempted in order to develop the techniques involved.

The first Discoverer vehicle is a 2-stage rocket. The main stage is a modified Thor IRBM produced by the Douglas Aircraft Co. The second stage is a new vehicle produced by the Lockheed Aircraft Corp. and powered by a Bell-Hustler engine.

The first Discoverer-launched satellites are expected to weigh approximately 1,300 pounds. This includes the weight of the second stage vehicle which will orbit as an integral part of the satellite after burnout. Initial versions of the Discoverer satellite are designed to orbit for short periods of time at relatively low altitude. High altitudes are not possible with the weight-thrust ratio established for the Discoverer.

Much of the data expected to be obtained from project Discoverer, such as results of the biomedical flights, will be of general scientific interest and will be unclassified. Other results which will be highly significant for the development of later systems and techniques for space navigation involve national security and will be classified.

The Dayton Daily News, December 5, 1958, reprinted by the Associated Press, December 14, 1958:

NARY A MOUSE SQUEAK, EITHER—MONKEYS AIN'T TALKING ON SATELLITES

Monkey business at the Wright Air Development center is classified top secret.

About 2 weeks ago when the Daily News heard monkeys might be "in training" for space travel at the base here, a reporter queried public information officials and was told "monkeys are classified."

Then when it was announced Wednesday by the Department of Defense in Washington that the United States will start firing a series of big satellites from California in the next few weeks—and that some will carry mice and monkeys—the queries started over.

Were some of the mice and monkeys involved in the project being trained or tested at WADC's Aero Medical laboratory? And if so, could they meet the press?

"That was a D. of D. (Department of Defense) announcement and not an ARDC (Air Research and Development Command) or a WADC (Wright Air Development Center) announcement," answered a public information officer. "We don't have anything to do with their monkeys."

So what about mice?

"You'll have to talk to the PIO (Public Information Officer) in charge of the Aero Med lab about that."

"We can't talk about anything in that area," reported the second PIO.

Monkeys or mice?

"Either."

"No comment," interjected the first PIO.

Since humans who have been involved in space medicine tests, such as isolation for long periods at the Aero Medical laboratory, have emerged to hold press conferences it didn't appear that a monkey or mouse could say much to endanger national security.

Therefore a call to the Pentagon and to the top echelon of Air Force PIOs was indicated.

At 2:30 p.m. yesterday a general came on the phone. "Monkeys? Mice? I don't know about that situation. I'd better let you talk to our colonel who is in charge of Operation Discoverer." Discoverer is the Defense Department's tag for the project that will send the now-incommunicado monkeys and mice chattering off into space.

"I don't know where they are or if they're classified," the colonel in charge of the project said.

Reminded that most of the space medicine experiments in the past involving human weren't classified and asked how come monkeys might be, the colonel answered: "Well, we've got to think of every little thing, you know."

Well, would he find out about the monkeys and the mice?

"Most certainly will. Most certainly."

Twenty minutes later the phone rang. It was the man everything started with—the first PIO at WADC.

"Had a call from Washington," he said.

So?

"He told me to keep my mouth shut."

So, apparently, will the space-bound monkeys and mice, wherever they may be.

But chattering away right now at the Washington, D.C. zoo are Pat and Mike, two monkeys who rode an Aerobee rocket into space for the Air Force in 1952. It is hoped they won't say anything they shouldn't.

The Dayton Daily News, December 7, 1954:

EVOLUTION REVERSING TREND? WADC HINTED APING FOR SPACE

(By Jack Jones)

If scientists are monkeying around under top secret security wraps at Wright Air Development center, they may be aping what will happen to the first man in space.

The advanced research projects agency announced last week that monkeys will be fired into orbit soon. Some people think the first space passengers are now in training at WADC here.

WADC says the monkey business is classified but does not say why.

Not having access to classified information, and therefore in no position to disclose any valuable secrets to the enemy, the layman may find it interesting to speculate what sort of monkey business WADC scientists might be up to, if they had any monkeys.

It is a matter of public record that Air Force scientists were involved in shooting monkeys and mice into space in Aerobee rockets in 1952.

Then, as now, one of the biggest problems puzzling scientists seemed to be the physiological effects to prolonged weightlessness.

A passenger in an earth satellite would feel no gravity. He wouldn't weigh anything and might tend to float around in his tiny capsule.

This condition has been simulated for short periods—less than a minute—in jet planes. But nobody knows for sure what will happen to the human body under long exposure to zero-g conditions.

Col. John Paul Stapp, head of the WADC's aero medical laboratory, was quoted last spring to the effect that he would want to send up and recover three orbiting satellites containing chimpanzees before he would consider it safe enough to try with a man aboard.

Now it can be assumed that Air Force scientists wouldn't just pick a chimp out of his cage and pop him into a nose cone compartment for his experimental voyage. They would make long and careful preparations so as to gain as much knowledge from each shot as possible.

The researchers would probably want to find out as much as they could about the effects of weightlessness, for one thing.

For this, during the actual satellite firing, they would have tiny wires taped to the animal's skin so his heartbeat, respiration, skin temperature, and other information on his physical condition could be telemetered to the ground.

But to try to determine whether changes in his heartbeat were caused by weightlessness or simply, say, by the feeling of being cooped up in a tiny compartment, the scientists probably would have performed earlier some baseline experiments.

By putting the animal in a tiny, earthbound nose cone, they could check, in the laboratory, what effect close confinement might have.

Similarly, they might well see how the animal reacted to the effects of the "g" forces that would be imposed by the rocket's blastoff. This could be simulated in the WADC centrifuge.

A space traveler is also expected to encounter other unusual conditions. His spaceship may vibrate. It may get very hot—during the blastoff and during the reentry—or very cold during the trip through the airless void beyond the earth's atmosphere.

He may have a limited oxygen supply. Prolonged breathing in the small space capsule could result in high humidity. His supplies of food and drink may have to be small because of space and weight limitations.

Most of these conditions can be simulated in the various climatic and environmental chambers of WADC's Aero Medical Laboratory.

Over the years, scores of volunteer human subjects have undergone tests to show how humans might bear up under these conditions or to discover what protective measures can be taken to insure the human's survival and possibly even his comfort. In these tests, the humans are often "wired" for skin response, just as the animals would be.

It can be expected that "space monkeys" could be put through the same tests in the laboratory.

Effects of the various environments would be determined with as much accuracy as possible to establish the scientists' baselines.

Then when the rockets roar off the pad and through the earth's atmosphere into the silent void of space, whatever different effects are observed via the telemetry channels can be assumed to be the effects of actual space flight.

And the scientists will have taken one more big step toward the goal of putting a human being into space flight.

The Dayton Daily News, December 7, 1958:

AIR FORCE MONKEY BUSINESS FOOLISHLY STAMPED "SECRET"

A picture of monkeys and mice cowering behind a curtain of official secrecy is less amusing than it seems. However trivial, the instance affords one more example of unjustifiable secrecy in conduct of public business.

Experiments with monkeys and mice in test satellite firings or other aspects of space medicine are not news to the enemy. Even if they were, they would scarcely give him any leads that he would not long since have been capable of developing by his own efforts. In information of this sort there is no faintly legitimate element of security.

Yet both local and Pentagon Air Force news sources have clammed up and refused to say whether animals are being used in experiments at the Wright Air Development Center.

Merely adding to the incongruity is the fact that Air Force and WADC information officers clamped down on news which days ago had been announced by Defense Department headquarters. Unfortunately, many areas of information which ought to be open to the public have been surrounded by unbroken walls of security.

Much that Government officials—not always confined to the military—tag with the label of "security" is merely information that might open the way to criticism, embarrassment, or public controversy. But criticism and controversy are the lifeblood of a healthy democracy. They should be abridged only to the extent that is necessary to protect vital military and scientific secrets.

The New York Times, December 8, 1958:

PRIMATESHINES

The art of "Washington Speak," as every ninny knows, lies in never calling a monkey a monkey. When the Defense Department announced last week its latest satellite program—this one to put living creatures in celestial orbit—it explained that the space travelers would be "mice and primates."

Did the Department mean "mice and monkeys"? someone insisted on knowing. "Mice and primates," Defense replied, doggedly.

Later, a loose-talker confided that those "primates" would be "monkeys," all right. Defense would rather not call them monkeys, he explained, because there are some people in this world who get as emotional about monkeys as Americans get about dogs. These people, Defense figures, are apt to complain about maltreating monkeys. Ergo, it will fool them with primates.

CLASSIFIED INFORMATION

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I am still somewhat in doubt as to what is bothering the gentleman from California [Mr. Moss]. Apparently, he claims that I liken some of his methods or thought to those of the Communists. Well, he did the same thing when he said I was using the tactics of the Communists. Of course, neither one of us meant that either had any agreement or like thought with the Communists. Methods are sometimes similar, of course—or something like that. All I can get out of what the gentleman said in the colloquy between himself and the other members of the committee—there are three of us on this committee, the gentleman from California [Mr. Moss], the chairman, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL], who is the other member, and I am the Republican member, the only Republican member on the committee. Before I start on this discussion, from my standpoint anyway, I want to say this: I have not made the complaint before, and I would not now had the matter not been brought up in the way that it has. These statements have been issued to the press and have been coming out for something like 2 years. They are issued under the designation of "chairman of the committee." The gentleman from California [Mr. Moss] is chairman and it is his statement, but when it comes out that way, it is charged up sometimes to the whole committee. I do not see these press releases before they are issued—and I am not complaining about it—I do not care—put out all of them that you want to.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. MOSS. If the gentleman had inquired, he would have found that the story that seemed to disturb the gentleman occurred because of a press release. This committee did not issue a press release which brought about the story reported by the Associated Press.

This committee has followed the practice, wherever we have a complaint, of supplying to the complainant—in this case the Dayton Daily News—a copy of the initial letter of inquiry that was addressed to the governmental agency giving them full opportunity to state their side of the case. The Daily News then determined to release that.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Well, I do not care to yield any more on that. What I said was that the press releases go out before I have seen them. Does the gentleman deny that?

Mr. MOSS. Most assuredly.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. All right. The first I ever saw of them was in the paper, and that is all there is to it. They run that committee. That is all right. I have no fault to find. I do not care what they put in the paper. I can answer it, especially when it is wrong, as it usually is. I do not know so much about the views of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL], but the chairman is thoroughly and honestly convinced that the executive departments are withholding information to which he is entitled and to which the committee and the press are entitled; that they are marking as confidential matter things that are not confidential. And in this last complaint they are inconsistent. At one time they are marking "Confidential" something that is not confidential, like the monkey in the zoo, to which the gentleman referred.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. MOSS. Is that not the position which the gentleman took himself during the previous two administrations, their withholding on the claim of privilege?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Sure. I introduced a bill which passed the House to make the departments give us more information. It is usually so that I and the other fellow are going to cover up our mistakes insofar as we can. The gentleman is not running around advertising his faults, nor am I, nor are the departments. The only place we differ is that under the Constitution certain authority is given to the President. That authority neither the Congress nor the courts have the right to question. If you are in doubt about the soundness of the views I am expressing, I ask you to go back and read the talk which the Speaker and the majority leader made when we had that bill before us at previous times. The Speaker said: "What are you going to do about it? Impeach him"? The only question is the authority of Congress. I have deliberately, when the Navy refused to give me and the committee information which was wanted, suggested to him that our subcommittee and the full committee ask the Congress to vote a citation for contempt, and the Supreme Court will lay down the line. The reply to that was that he thought we could get it in another way, perhaps by holding up appropriations, which perhaps we can. He also said in answer to my question that we have a nuisance value and we could force the department to disclose this information.

As I understand it, the gentleman thinks I challenge his intelligence and his loyalty, or something. I have the greatest admiration for the gentleman, especially for his determination to get something that he wants and he thinks he has a right to. I have been here 24 years, and if I sat down and tried half the night to dig up some ill feeling against some Member on either side, I could not do it.

Now that is a fact, although you may not believe it. I do not know of a Member who has been here since I have, whose integrity, whose patriotism, and whose intelligence I question at all.

We have differences of opinion, the chairman and I, when we get on some of these questions and he may flare up like lightning, but in 5 minutes he is over it and asking: "What do you think about this?" We get along all right.

Just get this into your head: I am not questioning your abililty, your patriotism, your zealousness, your intelligence, nor of your colleague from Florida; I do question this, we disagree and disagree violently on the authority of Congress to inquire of the executive departments of matters under their discretion under the Constitution. Now, there is all there is to it.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. MOSS. I turned to the RECORD of yesterday and in the place where I looked for enlightment as a result of the gentleman's statement in the REA debate regarding the activities of this committee, the gentleman undertook to discuss the subcommittee yesterday——

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I know about that.

Mr. MOSS. I enjoyed the gentleman's statement so I looked back there this morning to refresh myself again with his wisdom, but instead of finding the remarks he made in the House yesterday about REA, where the gentleman put himself on record, I found:

> Should congressional policy aid Russia to establish communism throughout the world—Russia's purpose.

Then the gentleman from Michigan goes on and says in substance that because I have urged that we clarify this ridiculous on-again off-again policy about secrecy—the reference to monkeys is a very inconsequential matter; the point at issue is that the same thing is done in every department and agency of the Government.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Oh, no.

Mr. MOSS. Now, I am not thick, and I do not think I am overly sensitive, but the gentleman was not trying to compliment me; I am most certain of that.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. What I tried to say was that it was just tomfoolishness and silly and a waste of public moneys for us here year after year to appropriate billions of dollars in foreign aid, give them military aid, send over technicians, and then to turn around and go along with the demand which the gentleman I understand makes, that we tell them all our secrets. That is the burden of my statement and that is the thing I object to, that is the thing I do not agree with.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. MOSS. The gentleman has been very kind. I merely point out that your judgment or my judgment I am certain would lead to a more consistent policy than has been followed. Here we are starting back again with the Defense Department saying that they are using monkeys for research, and then an inquiry comes to them and the question is asked: "Are you using monkeys for research?" and the response from the Department is: "We cannot talk about that."

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. All right; let us see what this all boils down to. It all boils down to some agency having disseminated a lot of information about monkeys and then afterward saying they could not talk about them. This Mr. Dechert says, or Murray Snyder said they could see the monkey in the Zoo. Then the chairman pops up, chairman of this Committee on Government Information, pops up and asks: "What is this about monkeys? Why did you not tell us about the monkeys?" And it turned out they knew all about the monkeys anyway, but again Dechert says: "We are not going to tell you anything about monkeys."

Mr. MOSS. The chairman did not pop up, but a very respected newspaper being somewhat frustrated because it could not get information——

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Some reporter could not get all the information he wanted.

Mr. MOSS. I do not know. In connection with the Dayton Ohio Press, the question was asked, What is the story? Is this classified or is it not? We would like to know.

That is all I know about it. I asked Mr. Decker to let us know.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

(By unanimous consent (at the request of Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan) he was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, now he is getting me off. They have reporters over there and information came up. They tell me they have three reporters on your committee?

Mr. MOSS. I have not any on my committee. I am not in the publishing business.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. You have two members of the press. Did they go up and get paid for speaking? The public has a right to know.

Mr. MOSS. If they did, I do not know. If the gentleman will help me I will find out.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. The gentleman's complaint, his quarrel, is with Dechert, General Counsel of the Defense Department, is it not? Sure. He does not like Dechert and Dechert does not like him. I do not know how I got into it except I do not believe that a congressional committee knows more about running the Defense Department than does the Defense Department. The gentleman has not any real complaint here because I have never questioned his ability or his intelligence.

Mr. MILLER of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. MILLER of New York. Do I understand the situation to be that a responsible news agency made a complaint to the chairman of the committee concerning the action of an agency of this Government; then the chairman of the committee wrote a letter of inquiry to the agency giving them an opportunity to state their position and before the gentleman from Michigan knew about it or before the agency had an opportunity to respond or to state its defense, that letter of inquiry was in the newspaper?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Let the gentleman answer. I do not know. I do not know what the committee does. They do not tell me. I just go over and help them make up a quorum.

Mr. MOSS. The committee wrote a letter on the 30th of March asking the Department of Defense to state its position. We have always followed the practice of supplying to the person or to the Member of the House, or to the newspaper giving us the complaint a carbon copy of our initial letter of inquiry. The Daily News determined to publish that letter. That was their privilege as it is the privilege of any of your constituents or any other individual, corporate or otherwise, to publish any letter they receive.

Mr. MILLER of New York. Then it was printed in the newspaper before the letter was actually received by the Government department or agency?

Mr. MOSS. That is correct. Not before it was received, some 4 days after it was received.

Mr. MILLER of New York. But before any response was received by the chairman of the committee from the Department?

Mr. MOSS. It has been my experience that it takes anywhere from 4 to 5 weeks or 4 to 5 months to get a response from a department.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. If the gentleman is interested in how this came about, let me say that the whole business apparently grows out of some complaints by newspapers. The easiest way for newspapers to get and sell news is through a congressional committee. So we had a panel of I have forgotten how many publishers, eminent gentlemen, fine, patriotic citizens all over the country, but they are interested in news. Then after that this big book of questionnaires was sent to the departments. Some answered and some did not.

Now, we have two or three reporters on the committee and they have pals in the news service. Of course they peddle information back and forth—nothing secret, just a matter of good will. These boys want to make news, and I will say this for the chairman of the committee, he sure has got mile after mile of political prestige out of the hearings and it is a wonderful and fine thing. There is a contest between the Department of Defense, I might say, and the chairman of the committee as to who hits the press first. That is laudable, too.

If I were in that situation, I would do the same thing, but not as skillfully as the gentleman from California does.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. MOSS. I would like to make the observation that the gentleman just continue to hope that some day he will be chairman of the committee, if his party is in power, and then he can try to get the good press we have enjoyed. I am very proud of the excellent press the committee has had.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Could you add a note in some of your releases saying a good word for me? Well, that is all I care to say on that. If the gentleman feels I have wronged him, hurt his feelings, you write me an apology, and if you do not make it too abusive for some Republicans who might be running against you, I will probably sign it and put it in the RECORD.

The other day I spoke about Inez Robb putting something in the paper about our shortcomings. In referring to the reporters in the gallery, I used the word "sponge." I said they were sponging off the Government. And, in some way, over in my office, apparently, someone thought the word "sponging" did not sound so good, so I left it out. Then two or three reporters came around, two of them, and criticized me for leaving the word out of the RECORD. I would like to make everyone happy. So, they can reinsert the word again if they think it will do any good. Though it carries meaning to which I do not subscribe in this instance. I have no fault to find with the reporters; they are fine young men, especially when they say a good word for us. There was no intention of charging that they did any more chiseling than the average individual, and that is all there was to it. I just wanted them, in view of the usual biannual panning we were getting, to judge Congressmen by the same standard they would like used on themselves. The press the next morning, the Washington Post, which is largely back of this subcommittee on information all the time, tailing it up, printed a list of things that the members of the press did.

The UPI, in the Washington Post and Times Herald, described reporters' perquisites this way:

> Congress provides newsmen covering its activities with work space, typewriters, copy paper, stationery, envelopes, and local telephone service. It also employs attendants to supervise the House and Senate press, radio, and periodical galleries.

Well, that is all right I do not care what they do. But, I want to please them. So, if they wish, they may put in the word "sponge." I cannot see anything particularly wrong about that. Now, if anybody else wants me to apologize, I will be glad to. Not having done anything for which an apology is needed one made will do no harm.

Mr. HOEVEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HOEVEN. I have listened attentively to the colloquy between the two gentlemen. It seems to me that we just have had a lot of monkey business.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. That or "much ado about nothing" or "a mountain out of a mole hill" or "heck to pay and no pitch hot."

JOHN FOSTER DULLES

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I was delighted to hear the distinguished majority leader, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK], speak in such praise and admiration of our very wonderful Secretary of State, John Foster Dulles. Many times he and I have seen often eye to eye in national defense matters and foreign affairs matters, and I was so glad to hear him say that he had such admiration for our Secretary of State. It has been very interesting to watch and hear various Members of Congress, both in the House and the Senate, change from criticism of the policies of the Secretary of State to great praise of his policies and of the man. I have followed his career for a good many years and I have always had admiration for his integrity and his ability and, of his high moral courage and, of late years, I have had tremendous admiration for the man's extreme courage in spite of the great physical pain that he must have endured. I sympathize very much with our President, President Eisenhower, in not having him entirely as active as he has been for the past years. He has been his right arm and his closest adviser.

And my appreciation goes to Mrs. Dulles, his lovely wife. I have watched her helpfulness and graciousness all these many years, her tireless devotion to him in every thing that he has stood for, always upholding his hand.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe there is a Member in the House today who does not think constantly of John Foster Dulles, out at the hospital, fighting to regain as much health as he can in order to continue to advise President Eisenhower and the country in our hour of trial.

I am extremely grateful that he and the President have kept our boys from fighting a hot war. The thousands of messages from all over the free world bespeak the gratitude and affection of troubled peoples everywhere. He has done much to prevent the spread of communism everywhere. Every Member of the House joins me in sending him a message of good will, I am sure.

JOHN FOSTER DULLES

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARRY] is recognized for 1 minute.

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Speaker, I do not want this day to pass without paying recognition to the greatest Secretary of State of our time, the Honorable John Foster Dulles, whom I knew not only as a statesman but as a friend and acquaintance for over 20 years.

I first knew Mr. Dulles as a devoted servant of the Brick Presbyterian Church in New York City, where he served as trustee for so many years. It was my great good fortune that our paths crossed again in the political arena at the 1948 Republican Convention and, in a later year, he gave me wise personal counsel at the time of the attempted re-creation of the bipartisan foreign policy which followed the death of Senator Arthur Vandenberg.

Mr. Dulles' greatest contribution to mankind has been his steadfast adherence to principles wherein he often stood almost alone, under combined and contrary pressures from within and without the Nation.

It is my belief that Secretary Dulles' inner strength came from devotion to God and love for his fellowman.

CIVIL DEFENSE ALERT, APRIL 17–18

Mr. GLENN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following instructions from the director of Civil and Defense Mobilization, concerning participation of Federal agency personnel in the Washington area civil defense alert exercises scheduled for April 17 and 18:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
OFFICE OF CIVIL AND DEFENSE MOBILIZATION,
Washington, D.C., April 14, 1959.

To: Heads of All Federal Departments and Agencies.

Subject: Participation of Federal Agency Personnel in the Washington Area Civil Defense Alert Exercise.

The public action phase of the April 17–18, 1959, civil defense alert exercise in the Washington area will occur on April 17.

It is essential to the success of this exercise that Federal agency personnel comply with the local civil defense instructions for response to the public action signals on April 17. Your agency representatives and building wardens have received instructions through the local civil defense staff.

The alert signal will be sounded at 11:30 a.m. The outdoor signal will be a continuous 5-minute sound on sirens.

Official instructions will be broadcast from 11:30 a.m. to 12 noon eastern standard time over the Conelrad AM stations on 640 and 1240 kilocycles.

On the alert signal, Federal employees in the Washington area should not evacuate buildings but should listen to the signal to become familiar with it and pay attention to Conelrad. (An effort should be made to have portable radios available for this purpose.)

The take cover signal will be sounded at 1:30 p.m. The outdoor signal will be a rising and falling sound on sirens for 3 minutes. On this signal Federal employees should proceed to their shelter areas as prescribed in the posted civil defense instructions and in compliance with the directions from their wardens.

With the exception of special arrangements for limited actions to test parts of local emergency plans, public buildings in the District of Columbia area will not be evacuated. The exercise on April 17, however, provides an opportunity for employees of Federal agencies in this area to become familar with the public action signals and the Conelrad program so as to be prepared to react in an emergency.

I will greatly appreciate your cooperation in this matter.

LEO A. HOEGH.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

This We Owe to Our Country

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. BEN F. JENSEN
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 16, 1959

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include my answer to a letter recently received from Mr. Charles H. Percy, chairman, Republican committee on program and progress:

THIS WE OWE TO OUR COUNTRY

APRIL 9, 1959.

CHARLES H. PERCY,
Chairman, Republican Committee on Program and Progress, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PERCY: I was pleased to have your letter of April 6. It states in part, "it is our belief that your own observations on the following questions would be invaluable to us in our efforts."

Your questions and my answers follow:

1. "What are the enduring principles by which Republicans must guide themselves now and in the future?"

Honest, efficient government. Oppose with all of our might, the wasteful spending of the people's tax dollar.

2. "What, in your opinion, are the chief dogmas we must discard?"

We have already discarded too many Republican dogmas. While those dogmas were operating, we built here the greatest Nation on earth. We must recapture many of those lost Republican dogmas.

3. "Trying to look ahead 10 or 15 years, what are the greatest problems you foresee for the United States and the Republican Party?"

Stay out of war, maintain a balanced budget, and prove to the so-called little fellow that he will suffer first and most from inflation caused by a constant unbalanced budget.

4. "In the same period, what are the greatest opportunities you foresee for the United States and the Republican Party?"

Broad publicity reaching into every home in America, reaffirming the Republican principles of the free private enterprise system for which we firmly stand; invite every loyal American to join hands with us, that they and their children may continue to enjoy the profits and blessings of liberty.

5. "Have you any other observations you think would be helpful to this committee in its attempt to state principles and objectives as well as analyze problems and opportunities?"

Yes, we should employ several of the very best editorial writers to be found. They should be scattered north, south, east, and west; they should take the offensive for our party. Publicize the virtues of individual Republican candidates from the courthouse to the White House, and nail the radicals, labor racketeers, and leftwingers in the opposition party to the mast with no holds barred. Use effective salesmanship for our party first, and then fight the lying opposition with truth and might. This we owe to our country.

Respectfully submitted.

BEN F. JENSEN,
Representative in Congress for the Seventh Iowa District.

A National Lottery

OF
HON. PAUL A. FINO
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 16, 1959

Mr. FINO. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to note that the people in the State of Oklahoma finally got smart by wiping out hypocrisy after 51 years of prohibition.

The Oklahomans voted to repeal not because they could not get liquor. The bootleggers were there to supply them with all they could drink. The good citizens of that State decided that as long as people wanted to drink then the best thing to do would be to repeal the law, get rid of the bootleggers and legally tax this thriving industry.

Mr. Speaker, I hope this Congress will also get smart and realize that the urge to gamble is deeply ingrained in human beings and that by proper Government regulations, supervision, and control we can bring into the coffers of our Federal Treasury $10 billion a year in additional revenue.

Mr. Speaker, the enactment of my national lottery bill would not only satisfy the American gambling spirit but would, in addition, wipe out a large segment of our professional gamblers, legally tap a lucrative industry and provide enough money for a badly needed tax cut and reduction of our national debt.

Statement by Hon. Cornelius E. Gallagher, of New Jersey, Before House Ways and Means Committee on Unemployment Compensation, April 15, 1959

OF
HON. CORNELIUS E. GALLAGHER
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 16, 1959

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, under leave, I would like to insert in the RECORD the testimony which I gave yesterday before the House Ways and Means Committee on unemployment compensation:

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am grateful for the committee's kind invitation to appear here today and the opportunity afforded me to express my deep and growing concern over the serious inadequacies in the unemployment compensation programs administered by our States. I have equal concern for the failure of the Federal Government to bring about much needed improvements in this badly neglected area of our economy.

I am heartened by the studied approach the members of this committee have taken to this important problem and I am confident the fruit of its attention to unemployment compensation matters will be a vastly improved program benefiting the millions of American workers who are now, or who may be in the future listed in the unemployed column.

I suggest that the legislative vehicles that will most efficiently and most expeditiously bring about the improved program we are all seeking is H.R. 3563, a bill for which I am privileged to be a cosponsor.

Passage of this bill would not only place the Federal Government in its rightful position of leadership in the field of unemployment compensation by providing for a standardization of State programs and fiscal guarantees, but it would, in addition, eliminate the inadequate provisions of this State's programs.

Most important, passage of H.R. 3563 would bring an end to the Federal Government's patchwork approach to the serious problems stemming from programs which pay the unemployed too little for too short a period.

As you may know, when the unemployment insurance programs were conceived in the depression years of the 1930's, 3 percent of payrolls was agreed upon as a proper rate to finance benefits. Since the very inception of the programs there has been a steady decline in the percent of payroll level to finance benefits.

The unemployment insurance programs were established with a view to paying an unemployed worker approximately 50 percent of his wage loss. In the early years, following the establishment of the program, there was near attainment of this goal.

Today, as this committee well knows, the percentage of loss of income made up by unemployment insurance payments is little over one-third of income lost through unemployment.

Among other shortcomings which H.R. 3563 seeks to overcome is the decline in the benefits received by the unemployed. It stipulates, as you know, benefits of not less than 50 percent of weekly income lost. This is the same goal established in the early thirties and here we are 20 years later still seeking it. I hope, and I am confident, that this time we will make it. However, this will be only if the standard is set by the Federal Government.

I hesitate to discuss provisions of the bill with which I know the members of the committee are thoroughly familiar. I do so only for emphasis in the record of points I consider to be pertinent.

It is most distressing that in this age of jet propulsion we have moved toward improvements in so vital an area of our national economy at a horse and buggy pace. In voting the extension of the Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act recently, we merely made another patchwork effort. The bill now being considered by this committee will bring an end to such crash measures as those the Congress has been compelled to enact in the past to keep our unemployed from near starvation.

We are seeking little more than the standards which were felt necessary when the unemployment compensation program was established more than 20 years ago. We are assuring a uniformity that will be fair to all of our States and work a hardship on none.

H.R. 3563 will take the tangle of State programs, with their great diversity of standards, rates levied, benefits paid, and the duration of payment, and apply a standardized program that will benefit the unemployed workers and give assurance of better protection to the worker who may someday find himself in the ranks of the unemployed.

This bill will go a long way in better equipping the Nation to combat another recession, for by providing sufficient and more realistic benefits there is stimulation of the economy through the maintenance of purchasing power at proper levels.

It is obvious to those familiar with the antiquated provisions of many State programs and the inadequacy of these programs that improvements are long past due. The changes advocated by this administration which would deny Federal leadership in this important field and leave the burden and initiative for improvement with the individual States, offer neither a solution to the problem nor the guidance and support for the States that are found in the bill presently before this committee.

There is, unfortunately, no evidence that unemployment particularly in the more distressed areas, will decline sharply enough in coming months to reach a normal level. Unless the Congress takes action to approve a standard and stabilized program of unemployment compensation, we may expect to be called upon at the next session to apply another patch in the form of further extension of the Temporary Unemployment Compensation Act.

In the Newark, N.J., labor area, which encompasses my own congressional district in Hudson County, unemployment increased by 13,000 in a recent 2-month period and now stands at 8.9 percent of the total labor force. There is a 10-percent increase in unemployment over this same period last year.

These are figures that cause great concern. Ours, like so many others with which the committee is familiar, is a distressed labor market.

The committee is conscious of the interest of our State Governors in this problem. A number of these State executives have called on the Congress to set up minimum standards for all States such as are provided in the bill you are considering.

The distinguished chief executive of my State is one of those so concerned. He has come to Washington at the invitation of the committee to discuss this very important matter. I am privileged to present to you, Mr. Chairman, and the members of the committee, Gov. Robert B. Meyner, of New Jersey.

OF
HON. PAUL B. DAGUE
OF PENNSYLVANIA
Thursday, April 16, 1959

Mr. DAGUE. Mr. Speaker, there is not an American today with concern for our relationships on the international scene who has not experienced a benumbing shock as he hears the word that our top diplomat, and one of the greatest international figures of the generation, has been immobilized by a malignant disease.

The tears which our President could barely restrain fill the eyes of all of us who have been unwavering in our support of our great Secretary of State, and as he bows to the inevitability of his Maker's decree our sense of irreparable loss is well nigh overwhelming.

In every public address which I have delivered during the last 4 years I have underscored as heavily as I know how our dependence on this great and dedicated American. And I paid special tribute to his philosophy of "going to the brink" as the only practical summation of the principles of a sound foreign policy that have been enunciated since Theodore Roosevelt's admonition as regards "carrying a big stick."

John Foster Dulles—diplomat, statesman, churchman—a soldier battling in the cold war who has been stricken on the field of battle. Here is a compatriot whose place in the Hall of Heroes is assured and whose place in the hearts of his countrymen will be kept forever warm by an affectionate admiration. May Almighty God in His boundless mercy put His healing hand on our brother and ease his hurt. And may He give us strength to carry on in the spirit of this patriotic American.

The U.S. Army Field Band of Washington, D.C.

OF

HON. TORBERT H. MACDONALD

OF MASSACHUSETTS

Thursday, April 16, 1959

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, there are many facets to the conduct of our foreign relations, and by no means the least of these is the remarkable manner in which the serviceman overseas represents his country as a citizen-ambassador. Similarly, the commendable efforts abroad, as well as at home, of the superb musical organizations of the Armed Forces is worthy of comment. One such fine group is the United States Army Field Band, commanded and directed by Maj. Chester E. Whiting, who formerly presided over instrumental music in the public schools of Malden, Mass., and a man whom I am proud to call a friend. All the citizens of Malden, which comprises a part of my congressional district, are proud of Major Whiting. Major Whiting and his talented and disciplined bandsmen have extended the friendly hand of American culture and tradition to eager multitudes throughout the world.

Considered by music critics to be one of the most proficient and distinctive musical organizations now appearing before the public, this band has traveled more than a million miles in recent years and is internationally famous as "The Kings of the Highway."

The Army's most-traveled band is composed of more than 100 of the finest musicians in the Army. Several are bandmasters themselves, and a number have played with leading symphonies. More than a dozen have been with the band since it was organized.

The Army Field Band was organized as the Army Ground Forces Band in March 1946, by Major Whiting, commanding officer and conductor since then. Capt. Robert L. Bierly, a native of Clearfield, Pa., has been executive officer and assistant conductor for almost as long. He is a graduate of Ithaca College, New York, and was director of music in Lynchburg, Va., at one time.

The Soldiers Chorus of approximately 30 bandsmen-vocalists is featured on every program. Formed with a nucleus of six musicians in 1947, the chorus is now rated as one of the best male voice groups on the concert stage.

Specialist 7 Eugene W. Coughlin directs the Soldiers Chorus, and is also the band's principal baritone soloist. Before entering military service Coughlin performed with organizations in the Los Angeles, Hollywood and San Francisco Bay areas. He majored in music at Concordia College, Moorhead, Minn., and completed study at the Los Angeles Conservatory of Music.

Paul V. Henry, member of a family long prominent in music circles in New England, is narrator of the U.S. Army Field Band, and is the possessor of a rich baritone voice, well known to millions of concert goers in all 48 States as well as Mexico, Canada, the United Kingdom, and Europe. A native of Malden, Mass., his musical career began as a violin prodigy.

The Army Field Band has criss-crossed the United States each year for the past decade. Concerts have been given in small communities as well as in major cities, bringing the world's great music to audiences in areas never before visited by famous bands. On tour more than 6 months each year, the soldier-bandsmen have appeared in all 48 States as well as in Canada and Mexico.

The band has also made three extensive overseas tours, sponsored by the Department of the Army and the State Department, where, official reports indicate, the Army bandsmen made an important contribution to President Eisenhower's people-to-people program to foster better international good will.

Praised by high Government officials as "America's musical ambassadors," the Army musicians went overseas for the first time in the late summer of 1952. Eight countries in Europe and the United Kingdom were on the itinerary. Major concerts in Great Britain were given at the opening of the Edinburgh music festival, in Royal Festival Hall in London and in Shakespeare Memorial Park at Stratford-on-Avon. In Europe the band performed in the concert hall in Amsterdam, the Luxembourg Gardens in Paris, and the Olympic Stadium in Berlin.

Spanish bull rings, French provincial market halls, Riviera seaside parks, and Scandinavian amphitheaters were crowded with audiences totaling an estimated 350,000 during the 12,000-mile good will tour of Europe in the spring and summer of 1957. Traversing the Continent from Oslo to Seville and from Lisbon to Belgrade, "The Kings of the Highway" played 43 concerts in 12 countries.

It was the first full-strength U.S. service band ever to appear in Yugoslavia, Portugal, Norway, Monaco, and Denmark, and the first to play in Spain since 1929. Highlights of the tour were an audience with Pope Pius XII, a concert at the royal palace for Prince Rainier and Princess Grace of Monaco, and a special performance for the officers and men of Tito's army in Belgrade.

During the spring of 1958, the U.S. Army Field Band made its first tour of Hawaii and the Far East, the first all-airborne trip since it was organized in 1946. The field band played a total of 45 concerts in 41 days.

The 7-week tour opened in Honolulu in May and ended there in mid-June, with 11 concerts presented in the Territory en route to and from the Orient.

During the 27-day tour of Japan, Korea, and Okinawa, the band played in 34 concerts before an estimated total audience of 150,000. In addition, it was reported that upward of 4 million viewed a concert televised nationwide by Station HNK, Tokyo. The next day, in Yokohama, the band received the first standing ovation ever given a visiting musical organization, according to city officials. Following concerts at Camp Zama, the bandsmen were airlifted to Korea.

Nearly 50,000 were entertained by the band at two concerts in Seoul. President Syngman Rhee and Mrs. Rhee as well as Korean Government officials were guests. Performances were also given in Pusan, Inchon, Tongduchon, and Munsan, the last two for U.S. and U.N. troops.

Six concerts in 4 days were played in Okinawa, including performances at the Stillwell Field House and the University of Ryukyus.

Returning to Japan, concerts were presented in Fukuoka, Yawata, Hiroshima, Tokyo, and Nikko. The largest indoor concert crowd of the tour, more than 13,500, attended the Nikko concert and 12,000 had heard an indoor performance in Tokyo the previous day.

The band's repertoire ranges from classical arrangements to popular tunes and novelty numbers, including a drum act which has been praised by professional jugglers as well as musicians. Vocal and instrumental solos are part of all performances. Each program is opened and closed with military marches.

The Army Field Band normally travels in a 10-vehicle motor convoy made up of four large buses, four heavy trucks and two sedans, all painted infantry blue. All equipment needed for a concert is carried and the bandsmen can set up and be ready to play within 30 minutes after arrival at a site.

The Army dress uniforms are worn for all major concerts—blue for fall and winter performances and tropical worsted for spring and summer engagements. Music critics have commented on the crisp appearance of the musicians as "befitting the perfection of the performance."

The primary mission of the Army Field Band is to tour, as directed by the Secretary of the Army, and to present free public concerts as the representative band of the Army, both in the United States and abroad. In carrying out its assignment, Major Whiting estimates the band has entertained approximately 10 million persons, including radio and television audiences, in the past decade.

Major Whiting was assigned by the Army to form the band in 1945, and has been commanding officer and conductor continuously since then. Each member is a top-caliber musician, handpicked by Major Whiting personally.

As a result of the band's outstanding performance, he is recognized as one of the most distinguished conductors in the Armed Forces.

Major Whiting studied at the New England Conservatory of Music, in his home city of Boston, and for more than 35 years has been organizing and conducting Army bands.

In 1923 he was appointed a warrant officer bandmaster by the Governor of Massachusetts to organize and conduct the 110th Cavalry Band of the National Guard. The last mounted band in the Army, it was called into Federal service before this country entered World War II. Redesignated the 180th Field Artillery Band, it was en route to the South Pacific theater when Pearl Harbor was attacked.

Under Major Whiting's leadership, the bandsmen served in the lines during the battle of Guadalcanal. He then reorganized units into the American Division Band, and took part in operations on other islands. The major served almost 3 years in the South Pacific, and was awarded the Legion of Merit and the Bronze Star Medal.

In the fall of 1944, the Army assigned him to organize and conduct the first combat infantry band. Composed of musicians, who were also combat infantrymen, it toured the Nation during war-bond drives and was known as "The Million Dollar Band." Musicians from this and other wartime bands formed the nucleus of the U.S. Army Ground Forces Band, organized by the major in 1946. This was redesignated the U.S. Army Field Band in 1950.

Major Whiting is well known as a versatile composer of both military march music and popular tunes. The excellence of his concert arrangements has won the band a featured spot at a number of national band clinics. In 1956, the band was awarded the Midwest National Band Clinic's bronze plaque for "music which has been an inspiration to soldier and civilian alike."

The conductor is a member of the American Bandmasters' Association and an honorary member of Phi Beta Mu, national music fraternity. He is the second conductor to be named an honorary lifetime leader of the Zembo Temple Shrine band of Washington, D.C. This distinction is shared with John Philip Sousa. The major is also the only U.S. Army Band director to appear as guest conductor of the famous Guarde Republicaine Band of France.

Corrupting a Nation Through Newsstands and Mail

OF
HON. JOHN P. SAYLOR
OF PENNSYLVANIA
Thursday, April 16, 1959

Mr. SAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, the problems of Congress and the executive department become more acute, more complex with each passing year. Today we are confronted with the growing Communist menace, a domestic economy afflicted with persistent unemployment, the conquest of space, radioactive fallout, and a host of other matters that can never be resolved without the assistance of a most sympathetic Providence. We must have God's help in attacking our Nation's difficulties, but we cannot expect it if we overlook considerations that should be as important to us as they are to Him.

One of our responsibilities is to make the laws needed to uphold the highest moral standards, and a vital step in that direction was made last year with the enactment of legislation designed to curb distribution of obscene literature. Law-enforcement agencies, religious leaders, and social agencies have long ago established that indecent literature is a prime influence in the corruption of adolescent character; that it leads to bestiality, perversion, and narcotic addiction. Even in the absence of professional scrutiny and statistical analysis, however, social consequences of permitting lewd photographs and printed materials to be obtainable by juveniles are apparent enough to alarm the most apathetic citizen. Whether, in fact, objectionable items of this kind are distributed for an audience that is either young or old is disgusting enough to rouse every respectable man and woman to take action against the practice.

The bill which we passed to counteract distribution of obscene literature was recently commended by the Catholic Standard, published in the Archdiocese of Washington, which observed that the "New, tougher mail indecency law is working." The newspaper pointed out that a California man and his wife has each been sentenced to 10 years in prison in the first legal action under the law. The couple was charged with sending obsence material from points in California and Oregon to Idaho. Under the new law they were arrested in California on a warrant issued by the U.S. attorney at Boise, Idaho, who previously could have taken no action against the offenders.

This development is most encouraging, yet we obviously have a long way to go to clean up our mails and newsstands. The House has directed its committee to explore the situation as it now exists, and further legislation may be found necessary. The Department of Justice has advised parents and other responsible citizens to get in touch with either the local postmaster or the local FBI agents when suggestive material is found to be entering a locality. Unfortunately, there has been some reluctance on the part of individuals to report such activity, an attitude that has precluded prosecutions similar to the California-Idaho case.

It is my pleasure to report that Johnstown Post 90, Amvets, is intensifying a crusade aimed to cleanup reading material on local newstands. These fighting Americans have no fear of any attempts at retaliation on the part of offenders, and they intend to make reading material safe for youngsters regardless of the tactics of the depraved newsstand operators who for personal gain are willing to corrupt their own neighbor's children. I would suggest that anyone who hesitates reporting a violation of the Federal law on obscene literature to the postmaster or to the FBI merely get in touch with Commander Tom Muldoon. You can be sure that you will get the action that is needed.

The Amvets are to be congratulated on this new patriotic activity. Their example, followed in other communities, can go a long way in wiping out one of the most vicious merchandizing abuses to which a nation can be exposed.

Bill To Exempt All Members of the Armed Forces From the Tax on Transportation of Persons

OF
HON. JOHN F. BALDWIN, JR.
OF CALIFORNIA
Thursday, April 16, 1959

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I introduced in the House of Representatives H.R. 6411 which would exempt all members of the Armed Forces from the tax on transportation of persons. This bill will amend the Internal Revenue Code to remove the discrimination which now exists against the serviceman on furlough who desires to go home by air.

In its present form section 4263(e) of the Internal Revenue Code provides an exemption from the transportation tax for furlough travel by servicemen in uniform provided that the fare paid for such travel is not more than 2.5 cents per mile. This limitation denies servicemen the use of air travel, tax free, since airline fares are higher than 2.5 cents per mile.

There are approximately 1,600,000 servicemen stationed in the United States and the average serviceman is stationed approximately 860 miles from home. These servicemen made, during 1957, approximately 1,200,000 trips home on official leave, furlough or pass. Of this total only 450,000 of such trips were made by air. In view of the substantial distance that the average serviceman is from home, it is obvious that more servicemen would travel by air to their homes were it not for the fact that if they did so they would have to pay not only the higher fare charged by the airlines, but also the transportation tax as well. It is estimated that the average tax payment on furlough and pass travel amounts to about $8 on the round trip. In view of the limited finances of servicemen this is a serious deterrent to their use of air travel.

Since military furloughs and official leaves are frequently of short duration, to require them to travel only by ground transportation, if they are to receive tax exemption, in many cases prevents them from spending their furloughs at home. This is certainly contrary to the public interest and an unwarranted discrimination against servicemen. Many of the men in military service are away from home for the first time. Certainly everything should be done to enable them to return to their homes and spend their furlough time with their families wherever possible. My bill would accomplish this result. It does not involve a substantial amount of revenue. On the basis of the data released by the Department of Defense and studies conducted by the Air Transport Association the total revenue loss which would result from deleting from section 4263(e) of the Internal Revenue Code the 2.5 cents per mile limitation would be approximately $4 million.

Hon. John Foster Dulles

OF
HON. GEORGE M. WALLHAUSER
OF NEW JERSEY
Thursday, April 16, 1959

Mr. WALLHAUSER. Mr. Speaker, the resignation of Secretary of State John Foster Dulles brings to an end the remarkable public career of a man dedicated to the service of his country, who, because of unusual ability and strength of character, has made an imprint on the pages of our history that will last for all time. His service in the administrations of both political parties is a clear indication of the esteem in which he was held by those in high positions. The citizens of our great Nation will forever be in his debt for his many and positive achievements in our behalf.

A Special Tribute to the Idlers and the U.S. Army Band for Their Wonderful Contribution to the Joint Session of Congress, February 12, 1959, Commemorating the 150th Anniversary of Abraham Lincoln's Birth

OF
HON. FRED SCHWENGEL
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 16, 1959

Mr. SCHWENGEL. Mr. Speaker, since the joint session of Congress on February 12, to commemorate the 150th anniversary of Lincoln's birth, I have heard much praise for the quality of the musical portion of that program which did much to establish the proper mood for this historic occasion.

It is in order, therefore, under leave to extend my remarks, to better acquaint you with the artists who performed on that memorable occasion.

Most of us are familiar with the U.S. Army Band. Units of this outstanding organization appear regularly at functions of this type. Their contribution to the joint session was another one of their fine performances under Maj. Hugh Curry. The choice of selections: "Adoration," "Spirit of Independence," "Man of the Hour," and "All-American Soldier" was most appropriate. I commend them for this wonderful music.

Few of us, however, know much about the choral group, the Idlers, so I would like to make a few facts known about these young men.

The vocal portion of the joint session was presented under the supervision of Bandmaster Donald L. Janse, who led the choral program by the 21-member Idlers, as they are most familiarly known.

They are cadets at the Coast Guard Academy in New London, Conn. Their program, as you know, included a medley of Civil War songs and a special rendition of the Gettysburg Address. Peter M. Thall of New London composed the selection of the Gettysburg Address as it was set to music. He was 11 years of age at the time he began the composition.

As performed, it was not pretentious music; however, the solemnity and character of the text had been respected from its musical conception. The setting began with a short canon, which simply stated in all voices, the opening phrase of "Taps." The rendition of other Civil War songs gave additional meaning to the entire ceremony. The Idlers have also appeared on radio and television shows and plans are being made for their renditions to be broadcast this year over Radio Free-Europe as a contribution to the Lincoln Sesquicentennial. Also, a musical program similar to that presented at the joint session was given on the occasion of the Lincoln Sesquicentennial Sabbath program at the Lincoln Museum—Old Ford's Theater—on Monday, February 15, 1959.

Kentucky's No. 1 City

OF
HON. WILLIAM H. NATCHER
OF KENTUCKY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 16, 1959

Mr. NATCHER. Mr. Speaker, for the third consecutive year Franklin, Ky., is the recipient of the annual Kentucky Chamber of Commerce award for civic improvement. Presentation of this award is contingent upon two factors: The winning city must have enhanced its desirability as a place in which to live as well as become more attractive to industry and business.

The friendly city is richly deserving of this honor. Its physical accomplishments during the past year include a new junior high school building, the opening of two industrial plants, Potter & Brumfield and Kendall Polyken, the development of five residential subdivisions, and numerous stores.

In addition, the residents of Simpson County have manifested their understanding of community spirit by exceeding the goal of the United Givers Fund by $2,000 and by approving an alltime record budget for the schools.

The various civic clubs, elected officials, chamber of commerce, Franklin favorite, radio station WFKN, and the Franklin Industrial Board have been instrumental in bringing these accomplishments to pass. These organizations set their course 4 years ago, and they have not deviated from their original goal. And as in all great achievements, the women have proved themselves indispensable. In behalf of the Business and Professional Women's Club, Miss Rowena Sullivan, president, accepted the honor and accompanying check for $1,000.

The primary motivation, the incentive which has inspired the residents of Franklin and Simpson County is not so much the desire to improve the financial standing of the county as to enhance its cultural values and make Franklin a more interesting place in which to live. The retention of her young people, especially the well educated, had become a problem of the first magnitude. In the beginning, a small group of men undertook consideration of this dilemma, but reaction to this movement was favorable, and in short time the project was community property.

Franklin, in most respects, is not unlike many other small towns in Kentucky. But her people possess an invaluable and unmeasurable commodity. They have great pride in their community, and their ambition will not tolerate anything else than the very best for Simpson County.

Mr. Speaker, being recognized as the No. 1 city in Kentucky for 3 successive years is an admirable feat. I feel deeply privileged that I am able to represent Simpson County in the Congress of the United States, and I know that her residents will work to continue Franklin's unparalleled successes.

Planning for Tomorrow's Needs

OF
HON. PORTER HARDY, JR.
OF VIRGINIA
Thursday, April 16, 1959

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, April 11, the Woman's Democratic Club of Norfolk held its annual Jefferson-Jackson Day luncheon. The members and guests of the club were greatly honored by the presence of our charming and able colleague the gentlewoman from Missouri [Mrs. SULLIVAN], who addressed the meeting.

Mrs. SULLIVAN's remarks were not only appropriate to the occasion, but extremely timely, interesting, and thought provoking. I commend the reading of them to my colleagues:

SPEECH MADE BY THE HONORABLE LEONOR K. SULLIVAN AT THE JEFFERSON-JACKSON LUNCHEON GIVEN BY THE WOMEN'S DEMOCRATIC CLUB OF NORFOLK, VA., APRIL 11, 1959

I do not guarantee that the talk you are about to hear will be anything unusual or special, although, of course, I will try to make it interesting if I can—but I cannot guarantee it will be special. On the other hand, the circumstances of my speaking here are a bit special, and you might be interested to know what makes them so.

First of all, I make it a standing rule not to accept speaking invitations of this nature so far removed from my own home district in Missouri. It is not that I am opposed to speaking outside of my district—or outside the House of Representatives. I enjoy occasions of this kind, joining with fellow citizens from other sections of the country to celebrate our mutual admiration for the Democratic Party. But the invitations cascade down upon us in such volume that it is impossible to accept them all and thus the better part of wisdom is to attempt as gracefully as possible to regret them all. And, frankly, my working schedule is so heavy that I almost have no choice in the matter.

In the 7 years I have been in the Congress I could probably count on one hand the number of such appearances I have made outside my district at other than Democratic national conventions or regional Democratic affairs, including Missouri.

As to this particular weekend, my being here is special in another way: I just returned to Washington a few days ago after 2 weeks in St. Louis. Naturally, I found my desk piled high with urgent problems—including things I could not have worked on while I was in St. Louis even if they had been mailed to me, and other things which I would have worked on in St. Louis except that they arose after it was too late for my office to get them to me by mail. In other words, even though the congressional recess was by no means a vacation—far from it—I returned to Washington to find as many pending problems there for me as if I had been on vacation. You all know what a vacation does to your work schedule—it ruins it. And in my case I'm having all of the headaches of coming back from a vacation without having had the vacation.

Much of that mass of stuff which was smirking up at me from my heaped-up desk is still there and what I have cleared out and taken care of in these last 3 days has more than been replaced by new crises and problems and assignments and urgent pleas of one kind or another. I represent a problem district, you see. Everyone seems to have problems, and most of them seem to think I have a magic wand to solve them all.

All of this is to say that under normal circumstances I would not normally consider coming down to Norfolk, and under the abnormal circumstances of the moment, with such a deskload of postrecess headaches facing me in Washington, I could not possibly consider coming here.

There are two explanations for the special circumstances of my being here, then. One is the high regard in which all of us in the House of Representatives hold your outstanding Congressman, PORTER HARDY—he is one of the most highly respected and effective Members of the House—and one of the most persuasive, too. And when he made a particular point of urging me to attend your Jefferson-Jackson luncheon, I found it extremely difficult to insist it was impossible for me to come. That was reason No. 1.

The other reason involves an even more illustrious Virginian—yes, even more illustrious than PORTER HARDY. I refer to your Thomas Jefferson, whom you join in honoring today along with the man I think of as the Harry Truman of the 1820's, Andy Jackson. I am sure Andy would be pleased if he were alive today to be likened to Harry Truman of my own State of Missouri in attitude and outlook and fierce devotion to the public good, and I know I couldn't say anything more flattering to Mr. Truman than to tell him I had compared him to his own idol of democracy, Jackson.

But Thomas Jefferson is particularly meaningful to us in St. Louis because, frankly, we owe our existence as Americans to him. Your ancestors here in the East fought for your freedom and they had a lot of help from ancestors of present-day midwesterners fighting alongside them. But, unless Jefferson had shown the kind of imagination and boldness we want and expect in our Chief Executives, there is no telling what flag would be flying today over St. Louis, and the whole vast area west of the Mississippi River.

In our most valuable downtown area bordering the Mississippi in what will be our most spectacular river vista—we in St. Louis, with the cooperation of the National Park Service, are building a dramatic memorial to Thomas Jefferson and to the territorial expansion of the United States accomplished through his Louisiana Purchase. This spectacular river park, overlooking the Father of Waters, near the point where Lewis and Clark began their heroic trek through the wilderness vastness, will be one of the truly impressive scenes of our Nation's many breathtaking views when present plans for the Jefferson National Expansion Memorial are completed in 1964, on the 150th anniversary of United States acquisition of the land. Dominating the park will be a huge stainless-steel arch designed by the world-famous architect Saarinen, symbolizing the role of my city as the entrance way to the west, an arc matching in concept the splendor of an America stretching majestically from sea to sea.

We are understandably proud of this joint Federal-local parks program in St. Louis; we are proud to dedicate it to the memory of one of our greatest of all Americans, your fellow Virginian, Thomas Jefferson. For we, too, also revere him. And I feel that in coming to Norfolk to participate in a good Democratic celebration of Jefferson's 216th birthday 2 days early—I think I'm right in my arithmetic that it's 216 years as of next Sunday when Jefferson was born—in any event, in coming into Virginia to talk Democratic politics to Democratic women I feel I am making an appropriate pilgrimage for a St. Louisan.

These, then, are some of the reasons why I have set aside my usual practice and have accepted your warm invitation to come here today. And, now that I am here, I am glad the circumstances were special enough to get me here. For I am enjoying my visit tremendously.

The reference I made a few moments ago to Jefferson's action in acquiring for the United States the vast territories west of the Mississippi is as good a point of reference as any to contrast the difference between political philosophies as represented by our two great political parties.

I understand that here in this area of Virginia the Republican Party is not unknown—although I am sure it is quite ineffective—but at least you do see an occasional Republican and you do have to contend with Republican arguments and Republican propaganda in your campaigns. Therefore, I know you will agree out of personal experience in politics that there are differences—and major ones—between the parties.

Undoubtedly, Jefferson's courage in committing the infant American Republic to an expenditure of such magnitude as $15 million—in a day when a million meant far, far more than billions mean today—was one of the great political decisions of our entire history. I can think of one or two Republican Presidents who might, in similar circumstances, have made a similar decision—but no Republican President that we have known in our time, certainly. How long can a great political party continue to go along without, at least once in 50 years, coming forward with a single political leader to match the political skill and courage of a Teddy Roosevelt? And poor Teddy, as you recall, finally had to give up on the Republican Party himself and start his own third party nearly a half-century ago. Since his day as Chief Executive, the Republicans have elected a number of Presidents—but not a single one of them has made a single dramatic decision of such far-reaching significance to America's future and the world's advancement as almost every Democratic President, at some time in his administration, has made at least once.

Going back—not to ancient history, but to the recent past—we have the examples on the one hand of a Truman galvanizing a disorganized and fearful world into a solid stand against Communist expansion which saved first, Greece and Turkey, and then all of free Europe, and served notice that freedom would not be bargained away or surrendered. No political project in all history has been of more significance than the Truman doctrine and the Marshall plan—the latter conceived by your illustrious Virginia soldier-statesman and put into effect by a courageous President from my State.

Think of the Roosevelt years—of the great decisions—bold, dramatic, incomparable in imagination and in effectiveness. Tomorrow it will be 14 years since Franklin Delano Roosevelt laid down his life for his country and for freedom. As long as any of us shall live who remember that day and that era, we will mourn for and revere him—and feel fortunate in our hearts that we had the privilege to be Americans at a time when his inspiring leadership restored our faith in our country, in our economic system, and, most important, in ourselves.

Woodrow Wilson's widow still lives and thus reminds us—in her occasional participation in Washington in ceremonial or social events—of the Democratic Party's saint-like political philosopher of 1913–20, also a Virginian, who breathed new life into Jeffersonian concepts and who dreamed the dream and saw the vision which today guides free nations everywhere in the pursuit of a secure world in which free peoples can live with their conscience and, yet, with each other.

On the other hand, we have had some Republican Presidents, too, in that period since Teddy Roosevelt left office in 1909. We had a Taft, a Harding, a Coolidge, a Hoover, and now Mr. Eisenhower. Except for the sorry choice out of the smoke-filled room of the Republican Convention of 1920, when Harding was selected, these men have all been regarded as conscientious Presidents, if perhaps inept in the demanding role of the Presidency, that is in the role of leading a dynamic Nation to new greatness.

As Republicans, these men regarded themselves as Presidents in the classic Republican mold of conservatives. And that's all right. But they—including Mr. Eisenhower, practiced their conservatism in the role of conservators—that is, to try to hold tight not only to that of the past which is good but to the status quo, to change nothing, to cling to the past no matter how moth eaten, to trod no new paths or pioneer no new concepts in government.

There are times when the American people think they need that kind of President as a sort of breathing spell from dynamic, dramatic, imaginative government. And of course 1952 and 1956 reflected the yearning for calm, for complacency, after the stress and noisy clashing of the political battles of 20 years and the horror of war.

Consequently, for 6 years we have had a don't rock the boat, don't do anything new, don't worry, don't experiment kind of National Government, and we have stagnated. The American people have now had enough of it—and have repeatedly said so—the most dramatic reiteration coming last November in that simply incredible Democratic sweep. And next year, well, the die is cast.

I have mentioned the Louisiana Purchase several times. Let me ask this—and I believe it is a fair question. Can you imagine our present Republican President and his present and former stand-pat advisers having the decision Jefferson made? I can just imagine the discussion which would have gone on in an Eisenhower Cabinet of 1803.

Mr. Benson would have said that we already had all the farmland we needed on this side of the Mississippi, much of it wild and uninhabited. Who could possibly eat the food grown in the new territories? Mr. HUMPHREY would have said it cost too much to buy the millions of acres of land and would cause inflation which would curl everybody's hair. Mrs. Hobby would have said that the whole idea was just socialism—and who could possibly foresee the use of any such vast territories as the Louisiana Purchase? We remember her as the lady who could not foresee the almost hysterical demand for Salk vaccine—although now that we have all of it we need, there are still mothers in this country who expose healthy little children to a crippling future by neglect in getting their children inoculated. This is criminal negligence, and a public whipping would hardly be overly severe punishment for any mother who neglects this important duty of protecting her children against polio.

But I digress—I didn't mean to go off on that tangent. But the original fiasco of vaccine distribution under Mrs. Hobby, plus the criminal negligence of those mothers who do not today take advantage of the present availability of the vaccine make me boil in indignation each time I think of it—and nothing reminds me of it so much as mention of the name of our first Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare. A woman in politics should bring to political life the warmth and humanity which are the greatest contribution to political thinking and governmental affairs that women can make.

In any event, to go back to 1803, I think you will agree with me that if the Eisenhower administration had been in office at the time and had been faced with the decision which confronted Thomas Jefferson, there would have been no Louisiana Purchase. This thought might cause you to lose little sleep, but to us in St. Louis, believe me, the idea is quite intolerable.

Seriously, though, the analogy is politically important, I believe. Under Republican administrations, as we have known them in our lifetimes, our country has been led always on a policy of drift—avoiding hard decisions—floating on a tide of circumstances which seem inevitably to have resulted in economic hardship verging 30 years ago on national bankruptcy. Even today, with so many enthusiastic statistics pouring out of the White House and Commerce Department on production, profits of big corporations, declining unemployment, and so on, the fact remains that we are still deep in an unemployment recession, and the outlook for millions of Americans—particularly for middle-aged workers and for those approaching retirement age—is so grim as to be alarming.

Yet Mr. Eisenhower announces he is very happy over a slightly more than seasonal decline in unemployment, while more than 4 million remain on the unemployment list. And we are told that by October, the number of unemployed might even be down to around 3 million. That is put forward as a statistic to cheer. Actually, it is one to fear.

For we are now turning out everything people want and can afford to buy. We are producing in abundance. Which member of the Eisenhower administration was it who commented during the 1954 recession that freedom is also the right not to have a job—you know, take the bad with the good, keep a stiff-upper-lip and so on. This is Republican dogma, as long as it affects somebody else.

No Democratic administration worthy of the political party label would stand by as complacently and idly as this one is doing in the face of a serious national crisis in employment and in purchasing power.

This Congress, believe me, is not going to accept such supercilious complacency from an administration charged with governing for the good of all Americans.

Congress, under our system, cannot administer national affairs. We cannot name any of the Cabinet officials or administrators; we cannot force the President to do much of anything if he refuses to see the need or act on it. We can provide the tools, we can provide the funds. We can point to the need. We can alert the public to the danger. We can even hobble the administration to keep it from doing terribly wrong things—if we hear about them soon enough. But we cannot as a Congress force affirmative action.

But as a people, we can—all of us insisting on action and making our voices heard. And that must be the role of every forward-looking American—particularly all of us who regard ourselves as Democrats—more particularly all of us who pride ourselves on being Democratic women.

Be a Patricia Henry—and demand that our leaders meet our problems head on. Old Patrick called for liberty; you, his descendants, must call for leadership from a weary and unimaginative national administration.

Mr. Eisenhower could easily find good administrators who can do the job if he wants it done. We have plenty of experienced Democrats who served magnificently in the Roosevelt and Truman administrations who could, with Ike's backing, get our economy off dead center—get Norfolk booming again—and St. Louis—and restore America's greatness and promise.

Mr. Eisenhower has only a little over a year-and-a-half to get things back into shape—or at least to get a good start on restoring real prosperity and confidence to the American economy—before the job will no longer be his.

After that, the problem will be ours. Whether it is handled by an Adlai Stevenson, or a Hubert Humphrey, or a Jack Kennedy, or a Pat Brown, or a Missourian I think a whole lot of, named Stuart Symington—or whoever our nominee is next year—I think I can assure you good Democrats of this fact:

The problems he faces will be met forthrightly and courageously—whatever they are. They will be tackled as a challenge to devise effective solutions, not to merely avoid rocking the boat.

The boat has been rocking—violently at times—in these past 6 years, largely because of the reluctance of the helmsman and the rest of the crew to head into the deep waves and plough through them.

What might have been mere swells on our economic sea have done us irreparable harm year after year because our national administration tried more to avoid them than to overcome them.

Let us look our national problems straight in the eye, whatever they are, size them up, analyze them, and overcome them. Only in that direction lies the progress we seek for our country, and for the free world.

Our party has always—since the days Thomas Jefferson conceived of it and gave it meaning—our party has always stood upright and unafraid against any challenge to America's progress. Our leaders have neither panicked in the face of nor hidden from, challenge. It's true that we do a lot of fighting among ourselves, we Democrats, and for what we often consider good cause. But when it comes to facing unafraid the challenge of tomorrow, we unite and close ranks and move ahead full speed into the thickest of the political fray.

Progress can come to America only in proportion to the willingness of our national leaders to stick their necks out for principle. Jefferson was maligned, abused, despised by the standpatters of his day. Jackson's name was anathema to the same group. Roosevelt was "That man in the White House"—a term spoken with venom and hate. Truman was ridiculed, as no national figure in our time has ever been depreciated and laughed at.

Our next president—whichever Democrat he may be—probably faces similar abuse such as was heaped on the men I have mentioned. That is because he will—whoever he is—if he is a true Democrat, insist on planning for tomorrow's needs rather than yesterday's.

Supported by people like you—by Democrats who want our country to continue to grow and not stagnate—the next president, whichever Democrat he may be out of our abundance of outstanding candidates—will have the opportunity to be a great president.

For that's the only kind we Democrats are used to.

Maine Will Be Host to First International Medical Conference on Mental Retardation

OF
HON. FRANK M. COFFIN
OF MAINE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 16, 1959

Mr. COFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of the House to a conference of worldwide importance to be held at Portland, Maine, from July 27 through July 31, 1959. The First International Medical Conference on Mental Retardation will take place during those 5 days and I take deep pride in the fact that leaders in the field of medicine and welfare in the State of Maine have initiated, organized and sponsored this significant meeting which is the first of its kind. I believe it is worthy of the widest possible attention.

Although I have no expert knowledge in this field, I am informed that within the last few years various important conclusions have been reached through research and informal observations of retarded children. The primary objective of the conference is to focus attention on problems that can be attacked scientifically. The participants will be eminent physicians from various parts of the United States, Canada, and Europe. The sponsoring committee, recognizing that the challenge surmounts international differences, is attempting also through proper channels to extend invitations to physicians beyond the Iron Curtain.

Those who are interested in this forthcoming conference may request information from the conference secretary, division of maternal and child health, Statehouse, Augusta, Maine. It is being organized by the Maine chapter of the American Academy of Pediatrics, Pineland Hospital and Training Center, Pownal, Maine; the division of maternal and child health, State department of health and welfare, and the Maine Medical Association.

Peter W. Bowman, M.D., Pownal, Maine is serving as general chairman of the conference. Edmund N. Ervin, M.D., Waterville, is chairman of the liaison committee. He is assisted by C. E. Benda, M.D., Arlington, Mass.; George Stevenson, M.D., New York, N.Y.; J. Rees, M.D., London, England; P. Plum, M.D., Copenhagen, Denmark; G. Frontali, M.D., Rome, Italy; Richard Maseland, M.D., Bethesda, Md. Ella Langer, M.D., Augusta, Maine, is chairman of arrangements and finance.

The program committee, of which Hans V. Mautner, M.D., Pownal, Maine is chairman, comprises Malcolm J. Farrell, M.D., Boston, Mass.; Howard V. Bair, M.D., Parsons, Kans., and Ella Langer, M.D., Augusta, Maine.

The Republic at the Crossroads

OF
HON. THOMAS B. CURTIS
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, April 16, 1959

Mr. CURTIS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, on April 2, 1959, Representative BRUCE ALGER, of Texas, made a speech in Webster Groves, Mo., "The Republic at the Crossroads." I wish to call his remarks to the attention of my colleagues and they are as follows:

THE REPUBLIC AT THE CROSSROADS

Those present are joined by many not present as I nostalgically review the past which this occasion prompts. This is a wonderful reunion, after 22 years, 10 months, which for me were chronologically: College 4 years; business 1½ years; military service 4½ years; business (including my own) 9 years; and Congress 4 years, a full and varied experience.

Here, in Webster, I learned my lessons. Here I acquired the foundation for the later experiences. I had wonderful youthful years, thanks to the people, schools, and environment, right here. Oddly, as I grow older this becomes more obvious and meaningful to me.

The thanks I would extend to those here, and those not here, will be through whatever effort I can put forth to justify their training, friendship, and help. Sort of in the father-son spirit, "Make the world a little better because you were there." Humbly, but with firm resolve to say thanks, exemplified perhaps by remembering Lincoln, "That we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; that this Nation shall have a new birth of freedom; that government of, by, and for the people shall not perish from this earth." I didn't think so much of that in Webster High or in war when I sent a combat buddy's gear home to his family. But I thought of it later, and I do now as a public servant, a Federal Representative, as we tonight reunite for a few moments as old friends—but now, not as youths, but as responsible adults with problems and a government on our hands—our hands. It's our government to preserve for those who follow, and in memory of those who went before.

I'm here because of your Congressman TOM CURTIS, not just to permit myself the pleasure of a wonderful reunion. This is not the gratuitous expression so often heard publicly or the flowery protestations on the floor of the House, as a prelude to destructive attack. For me, this is a token of respect for a hard worker, and I think of the Curtis subcommittee's work on the problem of life insurance taxation, which became a factual textbook underlying the study and hearings for this year's tax bill—a pity more didn't study this document. I predict these views, with TOM's additions this year in the minority views, in which we both joined, will be remembered in the future, becoming increasingly influential. TOM's effectiveness can be measured in committee and floorwork by a few simple examples. The reciprocal trade bill of last year in committee and floorwork shows his guiding hand as he reconciled the conflicting views of both parties and the objections of the protectionists. I say this from a most critical viewpoint myself, as a dissenter to parts of the program. More recently, TOM suggested the airport compromise that joined the existing allotment formula and the lower spending figure—in which Democrats and Republicans then joined. In committee such adjustments are often made through TOM's efforts as in the Mills-Curtis formula for last year's insurance taxation. And I commend TOM for courage—as his championing the facts in the Goldfine issue last year. As many popularly joined the attack like howling wolves, TOM stuck to the facts, reminding the House that regardless of respective sides in the argument, we were violating our own House rules created to prevent character assassination.

TOM's work time and again in the Joint Economic Committee is a guiding force, as in the current study of the 1959 President's Economic Report. It's a pity that the somewhat technical nature of the study of inflation, price stability and maximum employment lacks the glamour and public attention which its importance warrants. You would all enjoy the debate between TOM and several Members on Monday, March 9 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD). So you see, my visit is actually not a friendship matter, as such, but a matter of respect for and teamwork with a legislator who has courage, ability, and a dedication to principles, which my remarks tonight will, I hope, further explain.

As a small businessman who knew little of the ins and outs of politics, and as a Republican in an overwhelmingly Democrat area, I ran for public office 5 years ago and made but one political promise—that I would measure each piece of legislation by two yardsticks: (1) Is it a function of the Federal Government? (2) Can we afford it?

I promised I'd vote on each proposal according to whether or not it passed those tests, and letting the political chips fall where they might.

Having tried conscientiously to hew to that line for 4 years, a course described by some as political suicide, I was immensely proud when the people of Dallas County, in the biggest offyear turnout on record, roundly endorsed that attitude toward government by returning me for the third time as their Representative in Washington. But did I win the election?

What wins a given election? No one can ever be entirely sure. The time, effort, and money of many dedicated citizens, political amateurs, many of whom were previously unknown to me, won this particular election.

This much I know, and there is no need to kid ourselves about it. Dallas Countians, like others in the South, for the most part regard themselves as Democrats. But conservatives of both parties effectively united to stand behind an unabashedly conservative record in Congress, and they didn't balk at my own avowed Republicanism.

The Republic is at the crossroad. Whether it is to remain the traditional constitutional Republic in a democracy or become a centralized inflated supergovernment, antithetical to the beliefs of our Founding Fathers, which beliefs we have not countermanded, not really, nor do we intend to, I am convinced.

A democracy is government of, by, and for people. The people participate. A republic is representative government, wherein the people are represented by others of their choosing. A representative, then, represents all the people, but is elected by a majority of the voters. Here's one problem—it is not a majority of the people, over half don't participate.

A second problem implicit in our form of government is the assumption of an "informed electorate," that is, that the voters know the issues and problems confronting the Nation and its Government. To the degree they don't, the Government, as in the case of people not voting, is weakened. Using his judgment, the Representative, then, votes, representing his constituents, as he feels the majority of his constituents would, if in his shoes, facing the particular circumstances and facts. That simply is our form of government and the two problems.

We are at the crossroads because a majority don't vote, and those who vote (as well as the others) don't study the issues and aren't informed. The crossroads point which way we'll go—preserve constitutional government or embrace socialism or another ism.

It is now a question of preserving our Nation and its institutions. This is done through political parties. The parties must have sound principles or fail in this task.

It is to that job we must dedicate our principal effort. For, if we fail in it, there will not be much need to worry about elections. And, if we succeed—by awakening the American people to a recognition of their peril—victory at the polls will follow.

We must bring to our task more than just an urge to take power. A political party enters this fray ill-equipped unless it is armed with basic principles—unchanging beliefs so precious they cannot be sacrificed for any political victory. Without such principles, a political party is nothing more than a gathering of office seekers and their friends. Without principles, a political party, in the words of our President, is only a conspiracy to gain power.

I believe the Republican Party, of the two, is the only possible party now to accomplish this objective, as you will see. To me, this assertion isn't blind party loyalty either, by a long shot, but critical appraisal.

It is true that any party representing a broad cross section of the American people will encounter differences of opinion as to details and method. That is true of our party. In fact, I suggest that we Republicans have permitted these differences to become so magnified in our own minds and the public mind that the principles which unite us have been forgotten or ignored. As a result there has been all too much talk about hyphenated Republicans—liberal-Republicans, conservative-Republicans, modern-Republicans. It is time—if we are to face the challenges that confront us—that we start thinking, talking, and acting as Republicans—period.

Let us heed the words of Lincoln when he said: "I'm afraid of the result upon organized action where great results are in view—if any of us allow ourselves to seek out minor or separate points in which there may be differences of views as to policy and right, and let them keep us from uniting in action upon a great principle in a cause on which we all agree."

Let us remember that our strength can stem only from the basic principles which unite us.

These principles are so deep and instinctive that we have unfortunately too often felt it either unnecessary or too difficult to put them into words. But they must be put into words; they must be enunciated over and over again. Our beliefs and principles must be articulated so clearly and forcefully that there can be no doubt as to where we Republicans stand and why.

Let me presume here tonight to make a modest beginning at putting into words what we so deeply and firmly feel.

We believe, we Republicans, that no generation can live solely for itself but rather that it has the heaviest of obligations to preserve the Nation and its institutions, strengthened and improved, for those who follow. We know that our heritage was won only by the sacrifice of those who preceded us. We have the high moral duty to sacrifice, if need be, to preserve and protect it.

We know, as we face the problems inherent in preserving our society, that the right way is not always the easy way, but that we have no choice except to take the hard way if it is, in truth, the right way. We recognize that we will find ourselves frequently bucking the popular tide, for we know, just as surely as the Democrats, that there is little political appeal in self-denial. If we accept the responsibility of leadership, however, and that is one of the functions of a political party, we must serve as stern guardians of the national common sense.

We accept, as part of the responsibility of leadership, the duty of making clear to the people that the easy way, if it is wrong, leads only to the misery of retraced steps or the finality of disaster. Championing what we believe to be right may at times lose us political battles; but we are supremely confident it is the only way to a clear conscience and ultimate victory.

We believe in a government of laws which have as a principal aim the prevention of the seizure of dominant power by any man, or group of men.

We believe that the political and economic strength of a nation depend upon the genius of its people and that genius cannot flourish wrapped round with the chains of an all-powerful state or an all-powerful minority.

We believe that liberty is man's most precious possession and that it includes the freedom to have an incentive to produce. This has led to our faith in the soundness of an economic system based upon man's universal urge to better his lot. We believe that success, if it is to be the incentive for all, cannot be mocked and scorned and discouraged in an appeal to the envy of others.

We believe in a limited government as the best means of preserving individual freedom and initiative, but this does not bind us to the legitimate needs of our citizens or the challenges which confront our Nation.

We insist, however, that the needs the Federal Government is called upon to meet be real needs which cannot be met by individual initiative or by the unit of government closest to the people, and particularly, that they are not needs manufactured by those looking for special advantage or power.

We believe that the challenges to our Nation's survival can best be met, not through ill-considered actions based on fear or emotion, but by a nation which itself is guided by basic principles, proceeding confidently because it is physically strong, morally right, and carefully prepared.

It is because of these beliefs, these principles, that the Republican Party is called upon by its own conscience to move vigorously to the task of preserving our Nation against the present-day threats to its survival.

In my book there are today three great threats facing us as a people and as a Nation:

The threat of communism.

The threat of inflation.

The threat of new monopolies.

Each must be met head on. Each must be fought relentlessly if what we call the American way of life is to survive.

The first threat is the most dramatic and the most apparent. It stems from the rapid rise of Soviet military and economic power. We have seen the Soviet Union ruthlessly trample on the rights of its people and other nations in its drive to rule the world. By concentrating on the means to produce military power, it has rapidly industrialized its economy and achieved far-reaching scientific advances, a combination which has made it a real threat to world security. We may deplore their methods, but we ignore, at our own peril, the presence of vast military and economic power in the hands of a small group of men imbued with a fanatic belief in the inevitability of communism's world conquest.

The reaction of the Democrats to the more dramatic evidences of Russian military power has been characteristic. Conditioned from habit, their immediate response has been that we outspend the Russians and achieve victory through sheer weight of the American dollar. Democrat spending bills followed quickly in the orbit of the first Russian satellite and every new announcement from the Kremlin quickens their flow.

It would indeed be wonderful if all we had to do to preserve our Nation against the Russian military threat was to turn on a spending spigot. It is not that easy, and the political party which tells the American people that it is, is gambling recklessly with the future of our Nation. If, as a nation, we rely solely on scattering our national wealth to the winds in order to quiet every fear, we can lose this fight before we start.

We cannot meet the Russian military challenge by siphoning off and diluting our available resources, both of brains and materials. Yet, the numerous critics of our defense policies insist, when you put all their charges together, that we engage in just such a scatterbrained effort. The net effect of following the advice of a Symington, Johnson, Anderson, Jackson, or any other Senator or Representative who wants more money for a specific defense need, would be weakness through dissipation of our strength. It would be a defense based not on the best estimates of our National Security Council, the entire intelligence resources of the Nation, and the expert advice of our Joint Chiefs of Staff and our President, but on the worst fears of our most frightened politicians.

What it will take to beat the Russians at this gruesome game is a government and people ready, of course, to sacrifice whatever is needed for our overall superiority, but determined at the same time to proceed only on the basis of sound estimates, rational thinking, and carefully conceived plans which look not just to today but also to tomorrow. This is the hard road, and only a party of principle has the courage to stand up to the fearmongers and tell the American people it is the road we should follow.

It is clear, too, that only a party of principle can furnish the kind of leadership which stands fast against those Democrats who would sacrifice our world position in the face of the potent power of the Soviet Union. When it is all boiled down, the constant carping over the inflexibility of Mr. Dulles, the demands for a new approach to the Soviet Union, and the laments for the lack of viability in our foreign policy are nothing more than a frightened unwillingness to face up to the fact that you can't appease the Russian without losing your shirt in the process. We are confident the American people won't soon again be led down the so-called easy road of appeasement.

The second threat to our security as a nation is the insidious menace of inflation. Our response to inflation is not only significant in its own right but it cannot be divorced from the challenge of the Soviet Union.

No greater test of the principles of the Republican Party can be provided than in the fight against inflation. It cannot be successfully undertaken unless we are willing, as a nation, to think more of the future than of ourselves and to take the hard but right way so that our Nation and its institutions can be preserved.

As we move positively against the threat of inflation, we Republicans are accused of being preoccupied with balanced budgets, of being negative when we oppose unessential spending programs, and of having a narrow bookkeeping attitude toward the problems of our Nation.

I say to you: There can be no more positive programs, for our party or any party, than to try to save this Nation from the disaster which will take place if inflation, through habitual spending beyond our income, becomes the national way of life.

As we oppose programs which individually have vote appeal but which taken together lead swiftly and surely to national bankruptcy, we lay ourselves open, of course, to the demagog's cry. But what we seek is more important than any single spending program. Unless we can maintain the stability of our currency, we will not have the strength to support any governmental program, no matter how desirable—be it for defense, for scientific advance, or for human welfare. Bound up in the fight for a balanced budget is the question of whether our economy will have the strength and stability to maintain us in the battle for survival.

Let it be remembered that we have been living beyond our income in 23 of the last 28 years. The credit of the U.S. Government is at the breaking point.

It is not just the national budget that is involved in the Democrat spending programs. The personal budget of each and every individual and family is involved. An unbalanced national budget means unbalanced family budgets; it means loss of credit, of earnings and savings, insurance, pensions, and annuities. When unbalanced national budgets and inflation become our national way of life, they all go down the drain together.

There is also a moral issue.

The time has come to end the completely immoral practice of passing on to our children the debts we incur for our own immediate benefit. We could at least have respect for the morality of the spenders if they would suggest that this generation pay, through higher taxes, for the cost of the programs they so glibly propose. They lack the courage for that, and in many cases, like the Senators from my State, they not only beguile the people with vast spending programs but promise simultaneous tax reductions. Let us call a spade a spade. Mortgaging our children's future is basically immoral.

There is the question of equity.

The first obligation of government is to treat its citizens equally. There is no equity when a government spends to provide special benefits for some of its citizens, because they are politically powerful, at the expense of all other citizens. But, the inequity is tragically multiplied when a government must borrow and inflate its currency to do so. For inflation does not strike all citizens an even blow; it hits hardest at the weak, the unorganized, at those who lack the means to protect themselves from its subtle and devastating robbery, the widow living on insurance, the aged living on pensions. No government which pretends to serve all the people can retain their confidence if it promotes wholesale inequity by choosing the easy road of unbalanced budgets.

There is the issue of survival.

I have spoken of the military challenge of Soviet Russia and the kind of response we must make to it. Will we have the sheer physical strength for that challenge—no matter how many missiles are on the launching pads—if our underlying base of a sound fiscal structure and a strong economy are rotted away by inflation?

The answer, of course, is "No," but the Soviet challenge is more than military; it is a total challenge on the military, political, economic, and moral fronts. Can the United States meet that total threat with its currency debased, its credit gone, its economy in turmoil, its citizens divided and its morality compromised, if we adopt inflation as a way of life? Of course not.

Politically, can we hold ourselves up to the nations of the world as a shining alternative to communism if we are unable to keep our own house in order, if we display a fatal political weakness in our form of government by casting aside principle for the fatal charms of expediency? How can we be an example to the world if we cannot in times such as these even meet our current needs out of current income?

Can we meet the Communist economic offensive if through inflation we price our goods out of the world market and if the American dollar becomes a currency to be shunned rather than desired?

And morally, where does this Nation stand as opposed to immoral communism if it succumbs to the immorality of inflation?

Let no man tell you that those who fight against the unbalanced budgets which cause inflation are preoccupied with the mechanics of bookkeeping. We are preoccupied, but our preoccupation consists of the most urgent and positive program this Nation can undertake—the prevention of a national disaster. It is our job as Republicans, as a party of principle, to awaken the Nation to this clear and present danger.

The President has presented the Nation with a balanced plan for security and public welfare. He has presented a plan balanced as to income and expenditures. It is a truly Republican program. It is our job as Republicans to exert every effort to make this plan a reality.

I mentioned earlier that one of the basic principles of the Republican Party is the belief in a government of laws which have as a principal aim the prevention of the seizure of dominant power by any man or group of men. Because of this principle, the Republican Party is called upon to meet the threat of the new monopolies, powerful labor organizations under the domination of a handful of men.

Under Republican leadership, this Nation met the challenge of the seizure of dominant power by a few industrialists and financiers a generation ago. It curbed the power of the trusts when in the public interest it enacted antimonopoly legislation under Republican leadership.

Today similar power rests in the hands of men who dictate the policies of our national labor unions. It consists of vast economic power, the power to cripple an industry or a nation. It is economic power which has reached out so successfully for political power that it has taken over, for all practical purposes, the Democratic Party and now controls the Congress of the United States. It is a combination of economic and political power which threatens the national interest because it is a power which places its own interest above the interest of all citizens.

Curbing the power of the new monopolies will be infinitely more difficult than dealing with the old industrial and financial monopolies, for the new monopolists have wrapped themselves in the cloak of the so-called common man. They have been careful to inculcate the doctrine that their monopoly interest is identical with the interest, not only of union members, but all working men and women. No attempt can be made to curb the power of the new monopolies without incurring their charge that it is a move against the public interest.

But the public—the consuming public—does not benefit from the exercise of naked monopolistic power to raise wages, and hence prices, beyond the level justified by increased productivity—nor from the extortions of a Hoffa made possible by the power his monopoly gives him.

The public—the union worker public—does not benefit when its dues are stolen, or frittered away, or spent for propaganda or political activity against its wishes.

The public—the taxpaying public—does not benefit when the political power of the new monopolies is used to extract special benefits from a pliant Congress or legislature.

The public—the small-business public—does not benefit when its choice, confronted with the overwhelming power of a giant union, is to accede to its demands or go out of business.

The public—the farm public—does not benefit when the new monopolies drive up farm costs far beyond the ability to increase farm prices.

Nor can the public—all of us as free citizens—benefit when dominant political and economic power rests in the hands of a few men, no matter how much they claim to have our best interests at heart.

Let there be no mistake about it. The evils which have arisen because of the emergence of the new monopolies are the result of the power they hold in their hands. We cannot eliminate the evils until we restore the balance of power and to do so, we must curb the powers of the new monopolies even as we protect the very legitimate rights of working men to organize for their own protection and own welfare.

As a party of principle, we cannot dodge this issue. The Democrats must avoid it at the peril of their extinction as a political force. They are incapable of going beyond what the new monopolies will permit, and this consists only of wiping the smudges off from the faces of those union leaders who have gotten dirtiest in their greed for power. It's up to us to take the lead in a sustained effort to curb this threat to the stability of our Nation. It will in the end earn us the gratitude of the vast majority of the American people who, even now, sense the danger involved in letting unbridled monopoly power run loose in our land.

In these great tasks, then, in meeting the Communist threat, in fighting inflation, in curbing the new monopolies, we Republicans have a job to do. At stake is the future of our Nation and the security and happiness of our people.

There is only one way we can go about this task and that is to devote our every resource to it. We cannot succeed, in the face of an overwhelming Democrat majority in the Congress, unless we arouse the American people to the dangers which confront them and unless we imbue them with a belief in the principles we uphold. We must, through them, make it politically impossible, for any party or group, to lead this Nation down the easy road to its downfall.

We need to make our party an effective political organization. We need to enlist in our ranks the millions who believe, as we do, in the principles we uphold. We need the devotion, discipline and dollars without which a party cannot function. We need to tell our story, clearly, unhesitatingly, forcefully so there is no man in this land who does not know our party's principles, program, and goals. We need, in short, to get down to work.

And as we set upon this noble task of saving a nation, should the path look dim, the goal remote and the obstacles insurmountable, we can do no better than take courage from the faith that: "Right makes might, and in that faith let us to the end dare to do our duty as we understand it."

Mandatory Control Program on Residual Oil Imports

OF

HON. JOHN P. SAYLOR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

Thursday, April 16, 1959

Mr. SAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, from Down East have recently come some exceedingly vehement denunciations of the White House order creating a mandatory control program on residual oil imports. I think it is about time that our friends in New England pursue a more objective and consistent course in our old international trade program. In the first place, it is difficult to understand how a region of the United States that has already experienced very critical fuel shortages because of the unreliability of sea traffic in periods of hostility would object to any program designed to guarantee availability of supplies under similar conditions. The President's proclamation issued on March 10 was prompted because oil imports have so enervated domestic fuel industries as to seriously weaken the mobilization base. The President is aware that a fuel which must be transported over ocean lanes infested with enemy submarines could not be depended upon to run a war machine.

Assuming that those New Englanders protesting the White House order, have forgotten events of not too many years back, I should like to place in the RECORD a number of headlines that appeared in our newspapers during the early part of World War II when tankers coming from ports on the Gulf of Mexico were being intercepted both in the gulf and along the Atlantic seaboard. Here are but a few that I have taken from my files: "U-Boat Torpedoes Tanker Off Jersey"; "Tanker Sunk Off Our Atlantic Coast"; "Florida Crowd Sees U-Boat Sink Ship Off Shore"; "Two Tankers Torpedoed—One Off Jersey Witnessed by Thousands in Resort Towns"; "Allied Tanker Seen in Sinking Condition Off Long Island."

There is the story of what can happen on the high seas in wartime. I might also recall for your benefit that at one time an enemy underwater action was responsible for sinking a tanker within a short distance of New Orleans. In addition, at one time three tankers went down in the immediate vicinity of Dutch West Indies, which happens to be the principal source of the residual oil that moves into our east coast markets at the present time.

Now, how was New England affected by the inability to move oil over the water? As late as the spring of 1943, the fuel shortage impaired normal activity up and down coastal areas from Maine to New York. Earlier, the Petroleum Administrator in Washington warned New England to prepare for the worse. This headline from the New York Times explains the situation: "Ickes Says Worse Situation Is Coming and Asks Conversion to Using Coal." The wisdom of this prediction is confirmed in these 1943 headlines: "Hospital Is Ordered Closed by City To Save on Fuel Oil"; "Stillwater Worsted Mill Closed by Oil Shortage"; "Eight Rhode Island Textile Plants Forced To Close Today"; "Exodus of Labor Threatens Mills in Fuel Oil Crises"; "Fuel Oil Shortage Here To Close 95 Parochial Schools"; "Oil Shortage Forces Two War Plants To Close."

If further evidence is desired, I am sure that the Library of Congress will be happy to make available complete copies of the newspapers carrying these accounts of horror off the Atlantic coast and the subsequent difficulties in fuel-hungry New England.

The almost total destruction of tanker traffic in the early part of the war was effectuated by a nation whose sea forces included 150 submarines. Today, the Russians have a fleet of some 450 underwater craft. No power in world history has ever had so large a submarine force. Two-thirds of Russia's submarines are long-range ocean patrol types developed after World War II with the aid of German naval designers.

Adm. James S. Russell, Vice Chief of Naval Operations, in speaking before the Military-Industrial Conference in Chicago recently, included this paragraph in his report on Red naval power:

Quantitatively we may expect the Soviet submarine fleet to remain at about its present level; qualitatively, however, the threat to the free world will continue to grow as the older and smaller submarines are phased out of service and the number of new long-range types increases. These long-range submarines pose a threat not only to our vital traffic across the seas, but to our industrial centers as well, for the Soviets have the capability for arming these submarines with missiles and it must be assumed that some are already equipped.

With this knowledge, Mr. Speaker, can anyone here take issue with the President for his action based on the likelihood that foreign oil would be available in wartime? He knows the vital importance of vigorous domestic coal and oil industries. It was his responsibility as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces to proclaim the oil import order in behalf of America's mobilization program. I am hopeful that there will be no more contesting a decision made in the interests of national safety.

I also remind my colleagues from New England that there is no justifiable reason for your anticipatory fuel problems. These illusions were created even before the mandatory control plan went into operation. The amount of residual oil to be admitted under Presidential order is the same as was imported in 1957, at that time the highest quantity in history and almost equal to the 1958 figure. Thus the deluge may continue its deplorable economic impact on producing regions of the United States, and I assure you that I shall strive for legislation for a further cutback to a place where imports are in line with the tariff and quota protection afforded industries in other areas. Meanwhile, no one should anticipate any scarcity of fuel supplies under the decree. A considerable number of the east coast plants now on residual oil are equipped to convert to coal, which is available in adequate quantities at reasonable prices. Bituminous coal prices at the mine have remained steady for the past decade, and studies by outstanding industrial economists disclose no tendency toward a sharp upward movement over the long term.

I am, of course, conscious of the fact that residual oil has been available to east coast customers at prices slightly below what they would have to pay for coal. The importing companies have captured coal's traditional markets because they are able to adjust prices without any threat to the corporate structure. The profits from the sale of gasoline and the lighter oils are usually adequate to absorb the production and refining costs, so that residual oil is left over to be sold at whatever price will capture the market.

With all of this foreign residual oil—the more than a billion and a quarter barrels of it—that entered the United States in the past 10 years, what have the people of our country gained? What benefit has accrued to the populace of any single State or region? Residual oil cannot be used for heating homes, and you would not be driving any more if you tried putting it into the engine of your car. The big plants and generating stations are principal customers of this fuel. Their use of a foreign commodity in preference to a product of America's mines is certainly not inconsistent with the philosophy expressed by their representatives in Congress. Time after time members of the New England delegation have vociferously denounced trade policies that permit imports to impinge upon business conditions in leather goods, textiles, fish, lumber, bicycles, watches, and products of other New England industries.

This factor should be kept in mind when residual oil imports are under consideration. If our coal miners back in Pennsylvania are deprived of a means of livelihood because of a foreign invasion on their markets, where do we get the purchasing power for the goods that New England manufactures and sells? In my estimation it is about time that Members of Congress from the many areas suffering economically from unfair import competition collaborate on our identical problems. I can assure you that I have always concurred in recommendations to adjust international trade policies in such a way as to safeguard industries in New England, the South, and in other regions. I am convinced that we can get together if we consider the matter on a nationwide scale. Each year a growing number of communities is added to the list of industrial centers paralyzed or severely injured through inequitable import competition. The automobile manufacturers, who formerly led the free trade brigade into Washington when the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act came up for extension, have been noticeably silent in recent times. There is a definite fear that, unless someone puts the brakes on foreign cars entering this country, the big American jobs are going to get run off the road and unemployment around Detroit will be even worse than has been the case during the past year. Even the big office machine manufacturers, who once were proudly in the president's chair of a leading free trade committee, are beginning to wince when they walk into the Pentagon and see the large number of Olivettis and other foreign-produced typewriters and calculators.

The Presidential order restricting residual oil imports is designed to protect the Nation in emergency periods. It is certainly one executive department order to which no one in this country should object, yet restrictions on oil need to be bolstered considerably, and chances are that any help that we Representatives of fuel-producing districts can get will redound to the benefit of the rest of the country. With unemployment persisting on a high scale, I do not think we can afford to pass up the chance to get our people back to work.

Congressman Boggs Scores Hit in Chicago With Talk on H.R. 5

OF
HON. BARRATT O'HARA
OF ILLINOIS
Thursday, April 16, 1959

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I am extending my remarks to include a remarkable address by the Honorable HALE BOGGS, our distinguished colleague from Louisiana, at the 22d Chicago World Trade Conference. Congressman BOGGS spoke on the subject of "How To Encourage American Investment Abroad" with especial reference to H.R. 5. From the many letters I am receiving from Chicago I would conclude that few speakers have ever impressed a Chicago audience as did the gentleman from Louisiana on that occasion. The following letter is from Walker B. Davis, counsel of the Chicago Bridge & Iron Co.:

The Chicago Bridge & Iron Co. designs, fabricates, and erects large steel plate structures, such as tanks used for the storage of petroleum products at refineries and bulk stations, as well as tanks and other containers for many other industries. We have done a great deal of work in foreign countries. Sometimes we have furnished the fabricated steel, while in other cases we have erected fabricated steel supplied from outside the United States. We are anxious to continue our foreign operations, and also to expand them, but the tax burden imposed by the Government of the United States on the results of such operations puts us at a competitive disadvantage as compared with foreign contractors. Indeed, these considerations may force us to transfer the conduct of such operations to a subsidiary organized in another country.

I have had the pleasure of meeting Mr. BOGGS and listening to him speak on this subject. I think he knows a great deal about it and, of course, I need not tell you what a fine gentleman he is. Perhaps you will be interested in the enclosed copy of the address he delivered at the 22d Chicago World Trade Conference on February 27. I think it is as good a statement as I have seen of the reasons why this bill should, as I believe, be enacted into law.

Congressman BOGGS' address follows:

HOW TO ENCOURAGE AMERICAN INVESTMENT ABROAD

(Address by Hon. HALE BOGGS, U.S. Congressman from Louisiana, member, Committee on Ways and Means, at the 22d Chicago World Trade Conference, Palmer House, Chicago, February 26–27, 1959; sponsors: Chicago Association of Commerce and Industry and Export Managers Club of Chicago, Inc.)

I was delighted to receive the invitation to address this the 22d Chicago World Trade Conference. I am always glad for an opportunity to come to Chicago. Chicago typifies in so many ways the dynamic industrial, commercial, financial and political leadership which has made America great. I find here so much in common with my own home city of New Orleans. We, too, have problems of slum clearance, rehabilitation of blighted areas, and long-range planning for civic improvements and industrial development. And now Chicago, like New Orleans, is to be a major seaport and center of world trade. As you know, New Orleans is second only to New York in the dollar volume of world trade clearing through its port facilities.

The leadership of the Illinois Congressional Delegation under my esteemed colleague and dear friend on the Committee on Ways and Means, Hon. THOMAS J. O'BRIEN, is so persuasive that I have supported him on most matters in which you are interested—particularly in his valiant fight for increased diversion of water from Lake Michigan.

The spirit of friendly competition which may now develop between the new and expanded port facilities in the Chicago area, and other established centers of world commerce in the United States will be beneficial to all. As reflecting this spirit of friendly competition from New Orleans, I should like to remind you that the Port of New Orleans has maintained in Chicago for several years now an executive general agent, Mr. André Mouton, who holds membership both in the Chicago Association of Commerce and Industry and in the Export Managers Club of Chicago, Inc., the two sponsoring organizations of this World Trade Conference. These two great centers of world commerce, united as they are via the Mississippi River, can provide a firm foundation for the great volume of world trade which I am convinced holds the key to the longer range hopes for peace.

It is difficult to overstate the importance of an expanding volume of world trade to the long range security of the United States and the free world. To me, peace, freedom and world trade are indivisible. World peace hinges on world trade—not a permanent program of foreign aid. And trade can be mutually advantageous over a prolonged period only if all countries have the facilities to produce whatever the combination of their natural resources, the natural capacity of their people, and their available capital will permit.

I am convinced that the people of the United States have about had their fill of what appears to be an endless program of Government economic aid to foreign countries. I find in my travels throughout the world that the really responsible people in recipient countries question the soundness of an aid program on any permanent basis. As a temporary program to insure rapid revival of the economies of Western Europe following World War II, I firmly believe that the Marshall plan may have preserved from Communist unrest a most important part of free world culture.

But it should be apparent to all that something more dynamic and less artificial must now be employed to develop the economic resources of all countries outside the Communist orbit. The last Congress recognized the significance of further expansion of trade by extending the reciprocal trade agreement legislation for another 4 years. It is most encouraging that this program, conceived and inspired by one of the greatest Secretaries of State of all time, Hon. Cordell Hull, has now become truly bipartisan.

President Eisenhower has frequently stated that increased private investment is essential to the economic progress of less developed countries. In his recent budget message the President said:

"The greater share of investment capital and technical ability in the United States and other highly developed countries is to be found in private hands."

Thus far, however, the President in his series of messages to the Congress has failed to recommend any legislation in this area other than expansion of the program of guarantees to American private investors against losses caused by inconvertibility of currencies, expropriation, or war. Unfortunately, the administration still is in the study stage of possibilities for stimulating private investment abroad. As stated in the budget message:

"Studies are being conducted by the Department of State and the Business Advisory Council of the Department of Commerce on ways to increase the role of private investment, management, and technical training abroad."

It has fallen upon the Congress to assume the initiative in this as in many other areas which are vital to the American economy and the peace of the world. I say with some pride, we have a program equal to the task. Last December my Subcommittee on Foreign Trade Policy held a full week of hearings on the future prospects for U.S. private investment abroad. At that time statements were made by more than 50 representatives of agriculture, commerce and industry, and experts from government and academic life.

Most frequently mentioned in the testimony before our subcommittee was the recommendation for changes in the Federal tax structure to enable American private investment to go abroad on a basis competitive with investors from other countries. A number of specific recommendations were made for changes in the treatment of income from foreign sources. From these recommendations I selected those which seemed to have the greatest merit and common support. I have adapted these recommendations to conform with my own views, of course, and included them in a bill which I introduced on the opening day of the 86th Congress. This bill, the Foreign Investment Incentive Tax Act of 1959, will, I believe, encourage a substantial increase in American investment abroad.

The cornerstone of H.R. 5 is the provision for a new class of domestic corporation to conduct the foreign operations of American firms. Known as foreign business corporations, these companies would be permitted to retain the earnings derived from foreign operations for use in the expansion of foreign investment and trade activities without any immediate payment of U.S. tax. They would pay U.S. tax on foreign source income only when it is withdrawn from foreign operation, either by a distribution to shareholders or upon diversion to purposes unrelated to foreign operations. Income from foreign sources will qualify for deferral only if the foreign business corporation derives substantially all of its income from business done outside the United States.

In recent years, in order to compete with British, Canadian, French, or German businessmen, American businessmen have been compelled to seek tax shelter havens in Tangier, Lichtenstein or Panama, et al. Consequently, the proposed deferral of Federal tax burden upon earnings reinvested abroad will result in no significant loss of United States revenue; in fact, one of the witnesses before our committee predicted that, absent a change in Federal tax law during the next 5 years and assuming the world stays prosperous, he has no doubt that there would, at the end of this 5-year period, be little export income on which the United States will collect taxes. I firmly believe that United States businessmen should not be compelled to abandon the American flag when they go abroad: they should not be compelled to organize and operate under foreign flags but, instead, should be encouraged to go abroad and take with them their country's flag—and along with it the great combination of ingenuity, skill and daring that has made our free enterprise system the most dynamic economic system in the world.

You are all familiar with the tax treatment provided since 1942 for Western Hemisphere trade corporations. These corporations have been taxable at a rate 14 percentage points lower than the tax rates applicable to other corporations. These benefits are limited to a corporation which does all of its business in the Western Hemisphere. Section 4 of my bill would extend the same benefits to United States companies doing business in any foreign country if specified conditions as to kind and source of income are met. These qualifications are substantially the same as those now prescribed for Western Hemisphere trade corporations except for an increase from 5 percent to 10 percent in the leeway allowed for incidental income from sources within the United States. Experience has shown that the present 5 percent limitation is too restrictive.

I understand there was some surprise when I included this section in my bill. I have been told that the budgetary facts of life will not permit even the temporary loss of revenue. I am certainly in favor of a balanced budget and shall do all in my power to curtail unnecessary Government expenditures. But I say to you that our chance for a balanced budget will be greater, if we provide encouragement for American business to assume directly more of the risk of economic development in the countries in the free world. Indeed, there is very likely to be a greater tax yield from a 38 percent rate of return on the increased volume of foreign activities of American business than from a 52 percent rate on the more restricted activities under existing law.

The reason for enactment of the Western Hemisphere trade corporation provision in 1942 was that American corporations in South America were placed at a considerable competitive disadvantage with corporations from other countries. Since the same competitive inequity now exists throughout the free world, it is only fair that all U.S. corporations engaged in foreign trade should be treated alike. It is high time that we discard the provincialism which gave rise to this artificial distinction between East and West.

The 14 percentage point tax differential is justified by the same considerations whether the foreign operations be conducted in Pakistan or in Peru—in Burma or in Brazil—in the East Indies or in the West Indies.

One of the most perplexing problems encountered by American corporations which have engaged in foreign trade through subsidiaries organized in a foreign country has been that of shifting capital from a subsidiary in one foreign country to another subsidiary in another country, where the capital can be more effectively utilized. Under existing law it is not possible to make such transfers without recognition of gain or loss unless prior clearance is obtained from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Likewise, if the U.S. corporation finds it necessary to transfer appreciated assets to a foreign subsidiary, a taxable gain is recognized unless prior to the transfer the Commissioner looks into the transaction and senses no potential of tax savings.

I understand that some favorable rulings have been issued in some situations, but only after much delay—accompanied with considerable pain and suffering—and frequently on a very arbitrary basis. Section 3 of H.R. 5 would relieve this situation by providing that no advance ruling shall be necessary for property actually used in a trade or business outside the United States, or for stock in a corporation actively engaged in such a trade or business. The elimination of the requirement for advance clearance in such cases will be most beneficial to corporations which have been engaged in foreign trade for a long time; however, it will also afford assurance of companies now entering foreign trade that their capital can be shipped to other areas without arbitrary delays and uncertain tax consequences.

A potentially important technique for fostering private investment in underdeveloped areas is that of tax sparing. Many underdeveloped countries try to attract capital by waiving taxes for a limited period of time upon new enterprises, or upon investments in existing enterprises. However, a program of tax sparing offers no incentive to U.S. companies, for they must pay U.S. taxes on the waived profits. It has been suggested that American companies which accept in good faith tax waivers extended to them by foreign governments should be deemed to have paid the waived foreign taxes for the purpose of the foreign tax credit provisions of the Revenue Code. The Treasury and State Departments have been much interested in this policy, and have recommended that it be accomplished by tax treaties. While many of these underdeveloped countries are not yet committed to the Soviet bloc, they are readily susceptible to domination by the Soviet bloc if that should appear to them to be their only source of capital. We may alienate otherwise friendly nations by thwarting their efforts to attract American capital by nullifying their tax sparing program with our tax laws. A serious difficulty exists in the efforts to implement tax sparing by tax treaty. Tax sparing by tax treaty circumvents congressional authority in the field of taxation. I prefer a legislative mandate which recognizes incentive tax sparing by foreign countries as taxes paid for the purposes of the U.S. foreign tax credit. Section 6 of the bill provides such a mandate, but the Secretary of State will be authorized to certify unilaterally which foreign tax-sparing legislation will be recognized for U.S. tax purposes. Under this approach the Secretary of State will not be required to negotiate complicated and time-consuming tax treaties. He may, of course, if he deems it a wise policy, negotiate executive agreements with foreign nations in order to obtain reciprocal benefits. On many occasions, this should prove to be an extremely useful instrument in implementing the foreign policy of our country.

Since the foreign tax credit provisions were first introduced into the taxing system, there has been a need for a liberalization of the strict country by country limitation. Equality of treatment has long demanded that each taxpayer have an option to choose between the country by country limitation and an overall limitation in determining his foreign tax credit. I have provided for this liberalization by prescribing an alternative means of computing the maximum amount of credit which can be allowed against the U.S. tax with respect to any taxes due foreign governments. It is only in this manner that the fundamental purpose of the foreign tax credit—the prevention of double taxation of income earned abroad—can truly be achieved.

Section 7 of my bill would correct an inequity in the present law, relating to gain realized by a parent company upon the involuntary conversion of property belonging to a foreign subsidiary. Frequently, a domestic corporation must do business through a subsidiary in a country in which it is either impossible or difficult to secure adequate insurance coverage. In these instances it is a normal practice for the domestic parent corporation to insure the property of the subsidiary doing business in that country. If the property of the foreign subsidiary is destroyed, say by fire or by storm, the domestic parent is required to pay a tax at ordinary income rates on the insurance proceeds received even though it uses these proceeds to replace the lost property. This tax penalty deters investments in foreign countries where this insurance problem exists. There is no justifiable reason for denying the parent corporation the usual nonrecognition of gain upon involuntary conversions of this kind.

I have been much encouraged by the response which has followed my introduction of H.R. 5. Many of you undoubtedly have other equally sound proposals that you feel should be enacted. I am sure you will all recognize that there is a real danger in trying to accomplish too much. Many groups similar to yours have evidenced a genuine interest in this matter and have displayed an understanding of the necessity for the realistic approach which I have taken in this bill. I have been informed that the public advisory groups established by the President in the world trade area can be expected to come forward with constructive recommendation in the tax field. I would hope that these reports may be forthcoming at an early date. In any event, I am encouraged by the fact that the administration in Washington is at least interesting itself in this very vital problem.

Some of the proposals included in H.R. 5 have been discussed for years and have been recommended by careful students of the impact of Federal taxes upon private foreign investment. We have had enough study. Now is the time to put them into effect. The immediate importance of private investment in providing a sound basis for supplementing and replacing foreign economic aid calls for action at this session of Congress. The American people must be given a practical alternative to the indefinite continuation of $1½ to $2 billion a year in appropriation for foreign economic aid and technical development.

The most effective way to carry the message of the American way into the uncommitted countries of the free world is to make available to them private capital and business management, which this country can provide. In the long run we shall not make friends by giving handouts, and we can only teach the dynamic character of the free enterprise system by demonstrating directly how it works. This is a great cause, and I should hope that you might make it your cause.

The final decision on the future of this measure really rests with the business community—alert businessmen such as yourselves—genuinely concerned with private enterprise and with assuring that our foreign economic policy truly reflects the basic principles of our free enterprise system. You are aware of the challenges that confront us. With your support, we can reach our goal.

Thank you.

SENATE

FRIDAY, APRIL 17, 1959

(Legislative day of Wednesday, April 15, 1959)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

Rev. Hensel E. Hendrickson, pastor of Kensett Lutheran Parish, Kensett, Iowa, offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, help us, we beseech Thee, to be aware of Thy abiding presence. The presence that has been revealed to us by Thy Word—that Thou will seek the lost, will bind up the crippled, will strengthen the weak, will watch over the strong, and will feed Thy sheep in justice.

We thank Thee for men who, in gratitude to Thee, fervently believe that the Nation's business should not proceed without prayer to their Heavenly Father. Today, as people in our small world are looking to this Nation for leadership and for kinship, let their eyes focus first on this moment of prayer, its significance to our people, and the cost paid for its preservation.

May we learn to measure our days by the missions being accomplished to Thy glory. As we have been blessed, help us to be a blessing to others, as we seek lost, bind cripples, strengthen weak, watch over strong, and feed Thy sheep in justice. In the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

THE LATE SENATOR WILLIAM KERR SCOTT—RESOLUTION OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF NORTH CAROLINA

Mr. JORDAN. Mr. President, today is the 63d anniversary of the birth of one of North Carolina's most outstanding native sons, the late William Kerr Scott, who served with distinction as Governor of our State and later as a Member of the U.S. Senate until his untimely death on April 16, 1958.

Yesterday, the General Assembly of North Carolina adopted a resolution honoring the memory of Senator Scott.

On behalf of my colleague, the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN] and myself, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD the text of that resolution, which was drafted by Senator Scott's longtime friend, the Honorable Edwin S. Lanier, the senator from the 16th senatorial district of the State of North Carolina.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to lie on the table, and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A JOINT RESOLUTION OF RESPECT TO THE MEMORY OF THE HONORABLE WILLIAM KERR SCOTT, LATE A U.S. SENATOR FOR THE STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA

Whereas a year ago today, a day when the whole land and the skies above were filled with beauty and the new hopes of springtime, the people of North Carolina were shocked and saddened. Word was flashed throughout this State and across the country: "Kerr Scott is dead."

The Members of the U.S. Senate adjourned at once for the day in sorrow and respect for their deceased colleague. All the people in North Carolina, saddened that this man was dead, began to contemplate the brevity of mortal life and to weigh their numerous and lasting debts to this unique man of the soil of Alamance County.

This rugged, granitelike, determined, humorous man—so calm and "old shoe" in his outward manner, yet so dynamic in his energetic spirit—had answered with imagination, vision, and vigor many calls to duty during nearly 40 years of devoted service to the people of North Carolina.

A year ago today, in the later afternoon, from his bed in the Alamance County General Hospital where he had been resting his tired heart, the Squire of Haw River said to "Miss Mary," his devoted and faithful wife, "Tomorrow, you know, will be my 62d birthday. I want you to make 'em let me have some ice cream, a piece of cake, and a chaw of tobacco."

A few minutes later, Kerr Scott—farmer and public servant—always plowing his furrows deep and straight, every trying to help build a better North Carolina, and constantly needling the people of this State with his powerful challenge, "Let's go forward," came quietly to the end of his earthly row.

Throughout his life he was faithful in the worship services of the Hawfields Presbyterian Church of Route 1, Mebane, N.C. He upheld its program of community and social services.

He often said the eternal truth of the New Testament is that men and women should do unto others as they would have others do unto them. His philosophy of life and of government was based on his conviction that what is bad for any large segment of the people is bad for all the people. The first farmer in a hundred years to be elected Governor of North Carolina, he was a daring, progressive leader; an honest and forthright servant of the people; a builder; a democratic Democrat; a fighter for the welfare of the common man; and a true representative of the democratic ideals of Jefferson.

The example of his life, his services to the people, and the people's faith in him earned for him the immortal epitaph, "Devoted husband and father, beloved statesman, friend of mankind, servant of God." Kerr Scott—esse quam videri, to be rather than to seem. Man and motto—the same.

William Kerr Scott, born in the Haw River section of Alamance County, N.C., on April 17, 1896, educated in the Hawfield public schools and North Carolina State College, farmer and dairyman, died April 16, 1958. In succeeding steps he served the people as a private in the field artillery of the U.S. Army in 1918; as Alamance County farm agent; as master of the North Carolina State Grange; as commissioner of agriculture; as officer or board member of many organizations identified with the improvement of rural life; as Governor of North Carolina, 1949–52, and as U.S. Senator from November 2, 1954, until his death.

Whereas the General Assembly of North Carolina wishes to make record of its deep appreciation for the life and public services of William Kerr Scott and its sorrow on account of his death: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of North Carolina, the House of Representatives concurring—

SECTION 1. That in the death of the Honorable William Kerr Scott, North Carolina has lost a loyal son, a great citizen, and a distinguished leader and servant of all its people.

SEC. 2. That by these tokens the General Assembly of North Carolina expresses its genuine sympathy to Mrs. W. Kerr Scott, to her children, and to the brothers and sisters of the late W. Kerr Scott.

SEC. 3. That the general assembly acknowledges North Carolina's debt to Dr. David Leroy Corbitt for his editorship of the "Addresses and Papers of Gov. William Kerr Scott, 1949–53," including therein the biography of Governor Scott by Robert W. Redwine.

SEC. 4. That a copy of this resoltuion, duly certified, be delivered to Mrs. W. Kerr Scott, Route 1, Haw River, N.C.

SEC. 5. That this resolution shall be in full force and effect from and after its adoption.

EQUITABLE REIMBURSEMENT TO STATES FOR CERTAIN FREE AND TOLL ROADS

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to authorize appropriations for the Federal-aid primary system of highways, for the purpose of equitably reimbursing the States for certain free and toll roads on the National System of Interstate and Defense Highways. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may lie on the desk until the close of business on Friday, April 24, so that other Senators may join as cosponsors if they so desire.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will lie on the desk, as requested by the Senator from Connecticut.

The bill (S. 1714) to authorize appropriations for the Federal-aid primary system of highways for the purpose of equitably reimbursing the States for certain free and toll roads on the National System of Interstate and Defense Highways, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. BUSH, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Works.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, my bill is a companion measure to House bill 6303, introduced in the House of Representatives by the distinguished chairman of the House Committee on Public Works, the Honorable CHARLES A. BUCKLEY, of New York.

A statement by Representative BUCKLEY in explanation of the bill appears on page 5796 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for April 13, 1959, to which I invite the attention of Senators.

Mr. President, for several years I have urged Congress to do equity to the States which have contributed mileage to the National System of Interstate and Defense Highways, but which have not been reimbursed for their contributions.

The bill I have introduced today represents a refinement of previous bills I have introduced on this subject, the latest being Senate bill 570. Following the same principles, it proposes a practical method of compensating the States and of discharging the obligation of the Federal Government to them.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, following these remarks, there may be printed in the RECORD the text of the bill and a table showing the proposed reimbursements to the States.

There being no objection, the bill and table were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Interstate Highway Repayment Act".

SEC. 2. Congress hereby declares that this Act shall be the determination of policy with respect to reimbursement of certain interstate highways referred to in section 114 of the Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1956. SEC. 3. For the purpose of providing the additional amounts to which the States are entitled under section 132 of title 23 of the United States Code (as added by section 4 of this Act), there is hereby authorized to be appropriated: $225,000,000 per fiscal year for each fiscal year in the period beginning July 1, 1961, and ending June 30, 1966; $275,000,000 per fiscal year for each fiscal year in the period beginning July 1, 1966, and ending June 30, 1971; and $359,120,000 per fiscal year for each fiscal year in the period beginning July 1, 1971, and ending June 30, 1976. AMENDMENT OF SECTION 3731, TITLE 18, UNITED STATES CODE, RELATING TO CERTAIN APPEALS BY THE UNITED STATES

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill to give the United States the right to appeal, in a criminal prosecution, from a decision sustaining a motion to suppress evidence.

It has always been fundamental to our system of law that the accused in criminal proceedings be protected by every procedural safeguard in order to avoid harassment or conviction of innocent persons. At common law the sovereign had no right to appeal in criminal cases, and our Constitution guarantees the accused that he will not be placed in jeopardy more than once.

Over the years it came to be realized, however, that to deny the prosecution the right to appeal from decisions on those motions which in effect enabled the accused to escape without a conclusive trial on the merits greatly hampered the Government in its fight against crime. On the other hand, to allow the Government to appeal in such cases would not deprive the accused of any of the traditional safeguards to which he was entitled.

Congress proceeded with caution, and the resulting legislation—the Criminal Appeals Act, section 3731 of title 18 of the United States Code—confers on the Government carefully defined and limited rights of appeal in criminal cases.

My bill would add to that act the right to appeal to the court of appeals from an order granting a motion to suppress evidence. There is no question that this right is essential to efficient law enforcement; nor can it be argued that it denies the accused any safeguard to which he is entitled.

A prime example of how this weakness in the law can hamstring our enforcement officers is the narcotics case. The Government's whole case normally depends upon proof that the accused was apprehended in possession of illegal narcotics. Rule out the corpus delicti and the case must fail; there is no use in pursuing the matter further—the accused is acquitted without trial. The Government cannot have the determination reviewed, and under the present law the evidence can never be used again.

The same reasoning applies to other serious crimes, such as smuggling, violations of Federal Revenue laws, and very conceivably, to cases involving espionage and sabotage, with respect to which my bill would be effective.

While there have been similar bills introduced both in the House and the Senate from time to time, I feel that this bill meets a most serious law enforcement problem head on, in a simple, straightforward manner and in that respect represents a moderate approach which should be acceptable both to Congress and the courts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HART in the chair). The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1721) to amend section 3731 of title 18 of the United States Code relating to appeals by the United States, introduced by Mr. KEATING, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CURTIS submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him to Senate bill 1555, supra, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

ACTION NOW CAN STOP INFLATION

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, in the April 1959 issue of Nation's Business magazine appears an article by Marcus Nadler, professor of finance at the New York University Graduate School of Business and a well known consultant and authority on business finance. The article is entitled "Action Now Can Stop Inflation."

Professor Nadler has presented an excellent summary of the evils of inflation and of the dangers it creates for our economy.

He says that if the Nation wishes to curb the forces of inflation and to assure relative stability in the purchasing power of the dollar, four steps must be taken:

1. The efforts of the President to balance the budget during the next fiscal year must be supported. If defense expenditures must be increased, other expenditures should be lowered.

2. Management and labor must use restraint in forthcoming wage negotiations to prevent a further wage-price spiral.

Wage increases should not exceed the rise in productivity, and the benefits derived from the installation of labor-saving machinery should be shared by labor and management with the consumer.

3. The farm policy must be changed to stop the drain on the public, which now pays taxes to enable the Government to accumulate huge farm surpluses and at the same time pays higher prices for farm products. Moreover, this policy makes more difficult the sale of American agricultural commodities abroad on a commercial basis.

4. The Employment Act of 1946 should be amended to make it the obligation of the Government to strive not only for satisfactory employment conditions but also for maintenance of the integrity of the dollar.

Mr. President, I desire to invite the attention of Senators to a few other especially significant paragraphs of Professor Nadler's article. In describing the deterioration of America's competitive position in world markets, Professor Nadler writes as follows:

The productive facilities of the European countries have been rehabilitated. The new industries are operating with modern labor-saving devices. Mass production is spreading. It will receive a new impetus under the Common Market.

Until recently most European nations were not in a position to export large amounts of machinery, equipment, and other capital goods without long delays in delivery. Now, however, they can compete with us in delivery and quality.

Moreover, wage rates in the leading industrial countries of Europe and in Japan are substantially lower than ours.

As a result, prices of many types of goods are lower than for American products. For example, in the third quarter of 1958 the wholesale price index of machinery and vehicles was 122 for the United States (1953–100), 115 for Great Britain, and only 107 for West Germany.

It is clear, therefore, that creeping inflation in the United States will adversely affect our exports.

American manufacturers will be unable to compete with foreign nations in many lines. Imports will increase and the United States will not be in a position to raise tariffs or to impose import quotas on many types of goods because of the political repercussions abroad. Such a policy could induce some of our allies to seek more trade with the Soviet bloc.

The consequences of these developments will be:

1. Unemployment in industries affected by foreign competition will increase. This is bound to have an adverse impact on general business activity.

2. In the effort to mitigate unemployment, Federal expenditures and budget deficits will be increased.

3. The United States' favorable balance of payments will decline.

4. These combined factors may undermine foreign confidence in the dollar and lead to an outflow of funds and gold.

Should such a situation develop, the United States will face the choice either of devaluing the dollar in relation to other currencies or adopting a policy of austerity to bring costs and prices into line with those of other countries.

Either decision would be exceedingly painful.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire article may be printed in the RECORD following these remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ACTION NOW CAN STOP INFLATION

(By Marcus Nadler)

Creeping inflation is an economic disease. If continued, it will undermine the security of many millions of Americans.

It will deprive the thrifty of their savings. It will create large-scale unemployment and a highly volatile economy. By endangering the integrity of the dollar, it may weaken its position in the financial centers of the world.

Fortunately, the inflation forces are likely to remain dormant for the next few months. Now, therefore, is the time to take the proper steps to prevent a recurrence of this economic menace.

In spite of the rapid business recovery, the economy is still operating below capacity and unemployment is high.

Last year's abundant crops forecast a modest reduction in food prices, the most important element in the consumer price index. Federal Reserve authorities have adopted a policy of moderate credit restraint. The net effect has been that the wholesale price index has remained relatively stable during the past 12 months and the consumer price index has increased more slowly than during the preceding year.

If the Nation wishes to curb the forces of inflation and to assure relative stability in the purchasing power of the dollar, these steps must be taken:

1. The efforts of the President to balance the budget during the next fiscal year must be supported. If defense expenditures must be increased, other expenditures should be lowered.

2. Management and labor must use restraint in forthcoming wage negotiations to prevent a further wage-price spiral.

Wage increases should not exceed the rise in productivity, and the benefits derived from the installation of labor-saving machinery should be shared by labor and management with the consumer.

3. The farm policy must be changed to stop the drain on the public, which now pays taxes to enable the Government to accumulate huge farm surpluses and, at the same time, pays higher prices for farm products. Moreover, this policy makes more difficult the sale of American agricultural commodities abroad on a commercial basis.

4. The Employment Act of 1946 should be amended to make it the obligation of the Government to strive not only for satisfactory employment conditions, but also for maintenance of the integrity of the dollar.

These measures will impose no great hardships on the Nation.

If they are taken in time, the desired results will be achieved and inflation will be checked. If not, the Nation will eventually be forced to impose on itself an austerity program which will be much more painful than the relatively mild remedies now required. The experience of France and other countries which have recently tried to live beyond their means and adopted creeping inflation as a way of life should be a lesson to the United States as to where such a policy leads if it is not checked in time.

These countries provide an effective answer to those who claim that a mild form of inflation such as we have had during the past few years is desirable because it creates favorable business activity, increases employment, and leads to larger profits.

Those who hold this view imply that the United States must choose between mild inflation or large-scale unemployment. They argue that the stability of the dollar is maintained at the cost of the unemployed. Thus, a mild form of inflation fosters economic growth, while attempts to preserve the purchasing power of the dollar would lead to unemployment and economic stagnation. If this were true, the only way out of this dilemma would be to impose price and wage controls, which are not feasible in peacetime.

The problem is not as simple as that. It is highly doubtful whether reasonable price stability must necessarily cause unemployment. On the other hand, if a steady rise in prices is accepted as desirable, the number of individuals affected and the degree of suffering will be much greater than would result from allowing some unemployment.

It will cause such suffering:
By its impact on capital formation.
By contributing to a volatile economy.
By undermining economic security.
By weakening our world position.
By its constant threat of turning into a galloping inflation.

CAPITAL FORMATION

To cite one example of the ravages of inflation: At the end of 1945 individuals held $65 billion of Government obligations. By the end of 1957 these obligations, as measured by the consumer price index, had lost $23.9 billion in purchasing power. If one considers the vast amounts represented by savings deposits, shares in savings and loan associations, fixed-income-bearing securities, mortgages, pensions and annuities, the losses are multiplied.

Nor is it correct to assume that inflation leads to rapid growth in production and wealth. In current dollars the gross national product increased from $363 billion in 1954 to $453 billion (on an annual basis) in the last quarter of 1958, an increase of 25 percent. In dollars of 1954 purchasing power, however, the gross national product rose only to $408 billion, or 12 percent.

The defenders of creeping inflation, acknowledging that holders of fixed dollar assets suffer, suggest that they be compensated in one form or another. One method, they suggest, would be to include in fixed-income-bearing obligations a clause requiring payments commensurate with the rise in the cost of living, as was done in Finland. Such a provision, however, would create major problems. The Federal Government, the largest single borrower, would not know what its ultimate obligations would be. State and local governments certainly would not tie their obligations to a cost-of-living index. Many corporations would refuse to do so because of the uncertain liabilities involved.

If not checked in time, creeping inflation will also have an adverse effect on the capital market. The supply of long-term funds seeking an outlet in bonds and mortgages will be reduced at a time when the demand for them is likely to grow. With a condition of persistent creeping inflation, individuals will sooner or later realize that investments in fixed-income-bearing securities are not desirable.

Although the income may be absolutely safe, the real value of the investment and the return tends to decrease constantly.

Under such circumstances, individual investors will turn more and more to equities or nonfinancial tangible assets, such as real estate, and less and less to bonds and savings deposits.

The shift of institutional investors, such as pension funds, from bonds to equities is already pronounced. This trend will continue unless the upward movement of commodity prices is halted.

Another effect of inflation will be that insurance companies will press more vigorously for the right to sell variable annuities. If States grant this right, this phase of the insurance business will grow materially, further reducing the availability of funds for fixed-income-bearing securities.

At the same time, the demand for long-term funds will increase because, in the expectation of higher costs, corporations and political entities will try to anticipate their capital needs. The demand for long-term funds will thus tend to exceed the supply.

The commercial banks will not be able to meet the deficiency because under conditions of creeping inflation the Federal Reserve authorities are likely to adopt a policy of active credit restraint to reduce the availability of bank credit.

The effect will be a decline in home construction and public works, and possibly of public utility and other industrial construction.

In time, these factors will lead to a downturn in general business activity.

The impact of creeping inflation was aptly summarized by Ralph A Young, research director of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve:

"In the longer run, without a relatively stable price level, it is most unlikely that an orderly economic growth at the maximum sustainable rate would be attainable."

A VOLATILE ECONOMY

Creeping inflation tends to create a highly volatile economy. It brings maladjustments in wages and prices and leads to the adoption of a policy of strong credit restraint and ultimately to a decline in business activity, increased unemployment and reduced profits.

Inflation causes accumulation of inventories, which temporarily stimulates business activity. But the increase in prices of goods and services reduces the purchasing power of those living on fixed incomes. In time, the falling off of consumer buying power and the policy of active credit restriction bring the inventory accumulation to an end. Then liquidation sets in.

This happens at a time when the shortage of long-term funds is decreasing homebuilding, construction of public works and capital expenditures by corporations.

All these factors combined set in motion a sharp drop in business activity.

The first part of the cycle of creeping inflation is completed.

The Government's efforts to prevent the recession from becoming too serious and protracted actually prevent a correction of the maladjustments.

The measures taken by the Government to combat the recession lead to an increase in the public debt. Financed partly through the commercial banks, these result in an increase in the money supply. This in turn revives the fears of inflation and keeps prices from falling. Wages and other costs of production continue to mount.

The larger money supply, the renewed fears of inflation, and the increased government expenditures bring an upturn as business tries to hedge against higher prices by means of anticipatory buying. This upturn accelerates the wage-price spiral and is soon followed by a decline in business activity and another rise in the public debt.

Moreover, the constant rise in costs of production, notably wages, leads to the installation of more labor-saving devices with effects soon felt in the labor market.

Unemployment may, therefore, remain substantial even after business activity is renewed.

ECONOMIC SECURITY

Creeping inflation, if continued, will undermine the economic security of millions. It will reduce the real value of pensions and social security benefits. It will make savings of individuals less valuable in purchasing power and erode the value of life insurance policies and annuities.

So far these adverse effects have brought only mild protest from the people affected.

Within the next decade, however, the number of people aged 65 and more living on savings, pensions, and social security benefits will increase materially. These people are not likely to sit by and see their economic security further undermined without protesting or without bringing political pressure for remedial legislation.

Since private pensions, based on actuarial calculations, cannot easily be increased, the greatest pressure will be on the Federal Government to raise social-security payments and on State and local governments to increase pensions. This may lead to a material increase in social security and local taxes, in turn reducing the take-home pay of employed persons and adding to the tax burden of the employers. Or it may lead to increased Federal and local government expenditures and larger deficits, further feeding the forces of inflation.

Either of these developments is undesirable.

THE DOLLAR'S WORLD POSITION

Recently, most European nations returned to limited convertibility, which means that nonresidents may now convert foreign currencies obtained from current transactions freely into dollars. To maintain convertibility, these countries will have to employ strict fiscal and monetary discipline to prevent inflationary pressures.

Such pressures will lead to a curtailment of exports and an increase in imports. This in turn will result in a loss of gold or dollar reserves which, if not checked in time will force suspension of convertibility and imposition of exchange restrictions. European nations waited a long time before they took this big step toward convertibility.

It may be taken for granted they will do everything in their power to maintain the status of their currencies.

The productive facilities of the European countries have been rehabilitated. The new industries are operating with modern labor-saving devices. Mass production is spreading. It will receive a new impetus under the Common Market.

Until recently most European nations were not in a position to export large amounts of machinery, equipment, and other capital goods without long delays in delivery. Now, however, they can compete with us in delivery and quality.

Moreover, wage rates in the leading industrial countries of Europe and in Japan are substantially lower than ours.

As a result, prices of many types of goods are lower than for American products. For example, in the third quarter of 1958 the wholesale price index of machinery and vehicles was 122 for the United States (1953=100), 115 for Great Britain, and only 107 for West Germany.

It is clear, therefore, that creeping inflation in the United States will adversely affect our exports.

American manufacturers will be unable to compete with foreign nations in many lines. Imports will increase and the United States will not be in a position to raise tariffs or to impose import quotas on many types of goods because of the political repercussions abroad. Such a policy could induce some of our allies to seek more trade with the Soviet bloc.

The consequences of these developments will be:

1. Unemployment in industries affected by foreign competition will increase. This is bound to have an adverse impact on general business activity.

2. In the effort to mitigate unemployment, Federal expenditures and budget deficits will be increased.

3. The United States favorable balance of payments will decline.

4. These combined factors may undermine foreign confidence in the dollar and lead to an outflow of funds and gold.

Should such a situation develop, the United States will face the choice either of devaluing the dollar in relation to other currencies or adopting a policy of austerity to bring costs and prices into line with those of other countries.

Either decision would be exceedingly painful.

GALLOPING INFLATION

Creeping inflation can easily degenerate into galloping inflation. If the purchasing power of the dollar continues to decline and people become convinced that there is no real desire to check the inflationary pressures, they may decide to spend a part of their accumulated savings by anticipating their future needs and wants. Toward the end of November 1958, liquid assets held by the public in the form of currency, bank deposits, shares of savings and loan associations, and "E" savings bonds totaled approximately $322 billion. Even if a moderate portion of this sum were spent, a sharp increase in sales and heavy accumulation of inventories could easily follow.

In short, an inflation boom would be started.

Experience of the past has shown that such booms invariably end in disaster within a relatively short time.

NOMINATION OF MRS. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE TO BE AMBASSADOR TO BRAZIL

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, yesterday I was absent from the Chamber, because I attended, in Connecticut, the funeral of Mrs. Julia Keeney, of Somersville, a member of the Republican National Committee.

I have noted in the newspapers today that yesterday on the floor of the Senate there was some debate in regard to the nomination of Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce, of Connecticut, to be Ambassador to Brazil. I am sorry I was not in the Chamber at that time, because if I had been here I certainly would have defended the nomination.

I had the honor of escorting Mrs. Luce to the Foreign Relations Committee's hearing only 2 days ago, and at that time I urged very strongly that her nomination be reported favorably to the Senate.

Mrs. Luce is a highly distinguished public servant of the Nation. She served for 4 years in the Congress of the United States; and both in that capacity and in other ways she has shown outstanding ability. She has also shown excellence in the literary world and in the religious world. Finally, she has given outstanding service to the Nation as a diplomat, as our Ambassador to Italy for a period of approximately 4 years. Although there were many persons who doubted that that was a wise appointment, upon the conclusion of her service as Ambassador to Italy it was generally and very widely recognized that she had been a very successful Ambassador—indeed, an excellent one.

In view of her brilliant performance and her outstanding ability, I believe that we are fortunate that the President has nominated her once more to serve in this field—this time to be the Ambassador of our country to Brazil. I am confident she will give an excellent performance there, and I hope the Senate will promptly confirm her nomination.

UNITED STATES FOREIGN POLICY—ADDRESSES BY SENATOR FULBRIGHT AND AN EDITORIAL

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, yesterday the distinguished chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], delivered two addresses, one before the American Society of Newspaper Editors, in the city of Washington; and, later in the day, an address at the 10th anniversary banquet of the Reporter magazine, at the Overseas Press Club, in New York City.

I also wish to call attention to an editorial entitled "Nonpartisan Foreign Policy," which appears in today's issue of the Washington Post.

Mr. President, in view of the extreme importance of these two speeches and the valuable advice contained in the editorial published in the Post, I think it behooves the Senate and the entire country to read them with great interest and much care.

Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that the two speeches on the foreign policy, delivered by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, and the editorial which was published in the Washington Post, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the addresses and the editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS BY SENATOR J. W. FULBRIGHT, CHAIRMAN, SENATE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE, BEFORE THE AMERICAN SOCIETY OF NEWSPAPER EDITORS, WASHINGTON, APRIL 16, 1959

I want to talk to you not so much about our foreign policy, what it is or what it ought to be, as about our attitudes toward foreign policy and how we go about making it. Until we get straightened out on this latter point, we are never going to make much progress with the former one.

We are dealing here with what a former Secretary of State has rightly called "democracy's most difficult problems." They are the problems arising from the extraordinary, the almost incomprehensible, complexity and fragmentation of the democratic decision-making process. We see this process at work every day in a thousand ways, and it is by no means confined to the Federal Government. It involves collective bargaining contracts, decisions of investors, of buyers and sellers, of borrowers and lenders. It involves decisions of local governments as to what teachers salaries they will pay, decisions of industrial managers as to what prices they will charge, decisions of farmers as to what crops they will plant. The sum of all of these decisions, plus thousands of others, equals national policy.

Few of the people participating in making these decisions think of themselves as contributing to national policy. They quite naturally think of themselves only as deciding a limited question, in a limited context, with limited consequences. The result is that the policy which emerges from the sum of these decisions is quite frequently one which nobody has consciously willed.

We have inflation, not because anybody decided it would be a good thing, but because hundreds of thousands of people who bargain over wage rates and prices acted in a way to make wages and prices higher.

We have an inadequate school system, not because anybody is opposed to public education, but because tens of thousands of local governments have preferred to keep tax rates down than to push school budgets up and because too many parents have wanted their children to study baton-twirling instead of algebra.

We have an inadequate foreign policy, not because we want it that way, but because we have not yet brought ourselves to accept the realities of our position in the world and the inseparability of domestic and international policy.

And we have an almost unmanageable governmental machinery, not because anyone deliberately planned it that way, but because millions of individual citizens, exercising their constitutional right to vote, brought about this result. On top of the complex Federal-State system of checks upon the power of the National Government, we presently have the legislative and executive powers controlled by different parties. Such a Government is like having a motorcar with magnificent brakes but no motor.

If I may digress a moment at this point. Realizing the difficulty of moving such a cumbersome machinery, the majority leader of the Senate has endeavored to supply the motive power to get the machinery moving by an unusual display of energy and leadership. To my astonishment he has been vigorously attacked by certain of his colleagues on the grounds that he is at once dictatorial in his methods and too complaisant as regards the Executive. These attacks are unjustified in my opinion. Rather than less, we need more positive and energetic leadership, not only in the legislative branch, but especially in the executive branch of our Government.

In this area we are at an enormous disadvantage vis-a-vis the Soviets. One aspect of this disadvantage is obvious: A monolithic, authoritarian state, such as the Soviet Union, can mesh domestic and international policy much more readily than can a pluralistic, democratic state, such as the United States. This aspect of the disadvantage we can accept; indeed, we have to accept it, because we are simply not willing to pay the price—in terms of individual liberties—that would be required to overcome it.

But there is another aspect of our disadvantage vis-a-vis the Soviets. This one is subtler—at least, equally important—and less acceptable. It is that in the Soviet Union the people who participate in the decision-making process—and they are, of course, only a handful—have a very clear conception of their role in the world. In the United States the people who participate in the decision-making process—and they number literally in the millions—do not have such a conception.

That this is so is really not very surprising. Although individual Americans tend to be gregarious, as a nation we have historically been introverted. For most of our national existence we have been physically remote from the rest of the world, and even now most of us remain psychologically remote. We have had the better part of a continent, rich in resources, to settle and develop. Until recently foreign policy has not seemed important to our survival as it has to the states of Europe.

One consequence of this is that we have never developed the mass interest in diplomacy which one finds in Europe. More importantly, we have never developed a coherent, realistic national point of view toward the world and our place in it.

Historically, our excursions into foreign affairs have been primarily military—painful exercises which were to be gone through as quickly as possible so that we could return to life and business as usual. Even when we are not dealing with strictly military matters, we still use military terms. We talk about the cold war and about psychological warfare in—to use a cliche which I am thoroughly sick of—"the battle for the minds and hearts of men." I suspect that we still tend subconsciously to regard the cold war as an episode rather than an era.

In point of fact, however, the main problem which confronts us today is not a military problem, although the military aspect is of great importance. It is not even an economic and political problem, though this is of even greater importance.

The main problem is a psychological problem within ourselves.

It involves the question of how we are going to adjust ourselves to living in a world in which the only other power of comparable strength is, to put it mildly, unfriendly. Worse, how are we going to adjust ourselves, as we must a few decades hence, to living in a world in which the 600 million—perhaps by then 1 billion—Communist Chinese are a major power? In short, how are we going to get used to the idea that, like most other states of the past, we, too, now have to rely on foreign policy for survival? And how are we going to equip ourselves to do so?

We live in an age of revolution without parallel or precedent. We have said this so often that it has become trite, but we have not grasped the full enormity of its meaning. Disraeli, that wise 19th-century practitioner of diplomacy, said that "revolutions are not to be evaded"—and this one is no exception. It is time we looked it squarely in the face.

This revolution gains added force from its multiple aspects which act and react upon each other. It is compounded of the growth of Soviet power, of nationalism, and an insistent demand for improved living standards in underdeveloped countries, and of a technology which is accelerating at a dizzying pace. The Communists did not start this revolution. They are, in Robert Strausz-Hupe's phrase, "not the makers but the scavengers of revolutions." We would have many of our present problems if the Communists did not exist, but the fact of their existence—and particularly the fact of Soviet power—adds immeasurably to the urgency of our problems.

The urgency has also been greatly increased by the fact that the United States, without willing it and hardly knowing what to do about it, has been thrust inescapably into a position of world leadership. Under the circumstances, we have not done too badly. There is much in the history of the last two decades of which the American people can be justly and humbly proud. But, in Robert Browning's words, "he who did win the war, just earns the right to begin doing well in peace." We have done reasonably well, but not nearly well enough, and we are going to have to do a great deal better.

Before we can start doing very much better, we are going to have to arrive at a much deeper, more thorough-going national agreement about what our real national interests are.

At bottom, it seems to me, these real national interests dictate that we do what we can—and it will usually be marginal at best—to protect the 20th-century revolution in non-Communist Asia, in Africa, and in Latin America from the Communist scavengers. Our interests require that this revolution be given a chance to develop along constructive lines.

In dealing with the free people who are caught up in this revolution, we are going to have to realize that the rich and the powerful may be respected—if they conduct themselves so as to merit respect—but they are rarely loved.

We are going to have to realize that a democratic form of government in a middle-class social order does not clearly and necessarily represent the highest good to several hundred million or more of the people on this planet.

We are going to have to realize that a way of life is not necessarily inferior to ours simply because it is different.

We are going to have to realize that it is perhaps conceivable we can learn something from other people.

In short, we are going to have to grow up—to become more mature, sophisticated, humble, subtle, and wise.

Further, we are also going to have to pay more attention to the foreign policy implications of what we have always heretofore regarded as purely domestic decisions. This is especially the case as regards economic policies in general and the allocation of resources in particular.

Out of our incredibly complicated and fragmented decision-making process, we have got to arrive at some national decisions regarding priorities. If we get the kind of general national agreement that I am talking about, these decisions, I think, will be a good deal easier than they seem to be now. We will, for example, be more nearly ready to sacrifice short-term luxuries for long-term growth. We will be quicker to perceive that a greater investment in education today will give us the skills—particularly the knowledge of history and languages and alien cultures—that we will need to live in the world of tomorrow. We will understand better why it is that the world's biggest creditor Nation must export more capital and import more goods. We might even bring ourselves to put less steel into automobile tail fins and more into school construction.

It is easy for the Soviets to make these kinds of decisions regarding allocation of resources. They do it by fiat. It is difficult for us to make the same kinds of decisions, because although the Government has a role to play, it does not always have the dominant role, and it cannot play any role at all unless it has the support of the people.

I think the American people are capable of making these decisions, but first they have got to understand what needs to be done and why. This is a field in which the press has a great responsibility and so also does the Senate.

All of us, I think, tend to become overly preoccupied with the crises of the moment, currently with Berlin. Now, I do not want to underestimate the gravity of the Berlin crisis; it could well explode into world war III. But world war III could just as well be spawned in any of a dozen other trouble spots.

We are all, of course, interested in short-term policies and in day-to-day operations in situations like that in Berlin. But there is really not very much that either Congress or the press can do in these situations. Aside from the fact that the President has the primary constitutional responsibility, the Senate as a practical matter is very poorly equipped to deal with day-to-day policy-making or to try to outguess the President in this field.

The Senate, however, is very well equipped to deal with the longer-range, more basic questions which I have tried to touch on very briefly and generally. It is to these questions that I intend to devote most of my attention as chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

I intend to do so in a thoroughly nonpartisan way. Let me emphasize nonpartisan, and draw a distinction between it and bipartisan. Bipartisanship has been used too frequently to cloak the absence of a fundamental national agreement and to serve as a sort of synthetic substitute for such agreement. When misused in this fashion it can have several pernicious results. Too many people are given a practical veto over policy. There is an inhibition of the kind of free debate out of which a fundamental national agreement emerges. And finally, policy comes to represent the lowest common denominator.

Nonpartisanship does not mean the absence of debate on foreign policy. It does not mean the absence of criticism of those who are making—or not making—foreign policy. What it means is the absence of debate precipitated and carried on with a view to gaining a partisan advantage. It means the absence of criticism motivated by partisan considerations, the kind of reflex criticism in which a Democrat automatically denounces what a Republican has done, and vice versa. Under nonpartisanship, the opposition party supports or opposes the President on the merits of the policies, or lack of them, which he espouses. It does not oppose simply for the sake of opposition.

Significantly, Senator Vandenberg, who was one of the fathers of bipartisanship, did not like the word. He preferred, instead, unpartisanship or nonpartisanship, and so do I.

I do not think it is possible for a democratic country to have a viable, effective policy unless it is founded on the widest possible public discussion. Debate is a necessary ingredient of policymaking.

Out of this kind of debate, there emerges, over the long term the national sense of values which we must have if we are to hold our own in the world—and I hope we can do very much better than simply to hold our own. When we get a proper sense of values, we will not go through such agonizing soul-searching in deciding whether we can or cannot afford some of the things which, in my judgment, we must have. Until we do revise our sense of values, we will never think we can afford to do the things which, in my judgment, we must do if we are to survive as a Nation of free people.

The gravest crisis confronting the Western World today is not in Berlin; it is within ourselves.

What the leaders of the Western nations think they cannot afford, wrote an able observer 2 years ago, "is the political courage to demand of their peoples the sacrifices necessary to protect and promote their interests under the condition of atomic peace. In a word: the deficit is political and moral, not economic and financial."

What Makes U.S. Foreign Policy?

(Address by Senator J. William Fulbright at 10th anniversary banquet of the Reporter magazine, Overseas Press Club, New York City, April 16, 1959)

So many things honored in our time are themselves without honor, that it is all the more pleasurable to join the Overseas Press Club as it gives Max Ascoli the recognition that has long been overdue him.

I know that it sounds incongruous to speak of aristocracy in a democracy. Yet in the exact Greek sense of the word—meaning "the best"—it is very much in place to say that the magazine Max Ascoli built in 10 short years has been a stronghold of aristocratic values in our society. Every issue of the Reporter does something to restore discussion itself to the democratic process. Every issue reenacts in language the tremendous fact that the democratic process is a highly exacting, sometimes comic, sometimes dramatic, but always a supremely demanding experience. I often feel that the contributors to this magazine are regularly summoned by Max Ascoli to take an oath of office, reading to this effect: "I do solemnly swear that in the high cause of democracy, I will uphold, defend, and protect the integrity of the word, and that to the best of my ability, I will use words in such ways that they will stand as one with the things they are meant to describe."

Max Ascoli has himself said of the Reporter that it was an "experiment in adult journalism." I would add that it is an experiment in "unadulterated journalism". For its bite is a solid one. It has no pets and no client interests. It is known as a liberal magazine. But it stands just as ready to make war on the cliches and illusions that sometimes crop up in the liberal camp, as it does when a different order of cliches and illusions crop up in the camp of the mossbacks. It is precisely because it is always prepared to call even its natural friends to task, that it stands almost on a plane of its own in our affections. As friend or as critic, it summons all of us to heed the injunction: "Know thyself". And no injunction could be more pointed for those of us here tonight, whose work it is to keep the people informed of the material facts that bear on their life.

Happy birthday, then, to Max Ascoli, to his wife, Marion, and to the staff of the Reporter. May your readers increase. Happy birthday also to the present readers of the Reporter—some 125,000 of them—who would rather shiver in the icy wind of truth than be warmed by a blanket of rose-colored smog.

Still, I have not come here just to praise the Reporter, or, as it were, to bury it with praise. I have something else on my mind, and the occasion being what it is, this seemed to be a good place to say it. I hasten to add, that my remarks will not be in any way sensational. They will disappoint those who want me to invent for this occasion, new solutions to troubles in Berlin, Tibet, the Middle East, Africa, Southeast Asia, Latin America, the Formosa Straits—or, to bring the matter very close to home, Little Rock, Ark. I feel that we have had quite enough of speechmaking by public men who invent policies on the spur of the moment, from a misplaced sense of duty—the sense that they owe it to the press—or perhaps to themselves—to be the source of new sensations.

Instead, I would like to explore for a bit the question of what makes U.S. foreign policy—a subject, I hope, of some interest to ourselves and our allies.

Now I confess that when I put this question to myself, that when I thought about it a bit, the answer I came up with appeared in Book 11 of St. Augustine's Confessions. There the author raised the question of what God was doing before He created the heaven and the earth. A possible answer, St. Augustine said, was this: "He was creating a hell for people who pry too deep."

Still, despite the measure of truth in this reply, it is worth while to pry into my question, and for two reasons. First, the answer may shed some light on why we do or don't do some things in this or that particular sector of a troubled world. Second, the challenge inherent in my question is not confined exclusively to America. It was raised for all democracies as far back as 1832 by Alexis de Tocqueville when he wrote:

"Foreign politics demand scarcely any of those qualities which are peculiar to a democracy; they require, on the contrary, the perfect use of almost all those in which it is deficient. * * * [A] democracy can only with great difficulty regulate the details of an important undertaking, persevere in a fixed design, and work out its execution in spite of serious obstacles. In cannot combine its measures with secrecy or await their consequences with patience."

These are qualities, he concluded, that more especially belong to a form of social organization where the government is ruled by one man or a handful of men.

How true is this?

The paradoxical, indeed the frightening fact is that de Tocqueville's comment is a great deal more applicable today than it was when he made it.

Consider what happened between 1783, when we won our independence, and 1853, when the Gadsden Purchase rounded out our present continental limits. All of this territory was acquired by power and diplomacy, by a skillful maneuvering through the maze of European politics. And at the same time, we managed—with the help of the British fleet—to protect a whole series of nationalistic revolutions to the south from the unholy intentions of the Holy Alliance.

Moreover, throughout the whole of this process, while much was done by the action of individual Presidents, a great deal was done as a direct result of congressional action or by the direct play of public pressures, rising from a people whose life was being progressively democratized.

The key point is that the conduct of foreign affairs did not appear to be an elite function, limited to specialists in and around the Executive. Neither the electorate nor the Congress was ever overawed by the Executive claim to exclusive knowledge, or its claim that it would be against the national interest to disclose the facts relevant to a foreign policy decision. Foreign policy was debated in remote frontier outposts as well as in seaboard cities, with a shrewdness and a knowledge of great power rivalries that astonishes any modern reader who browses through the records of these debates preserved in our National Archives.

The stakes of foreign policy in those days were both visible and finite. They meant the difference between having a hostile power on our frontier, or not having one. The contrast with our present circumstances is obvious. The stakes of our foreign policy today are real enough but infinitely more complex. Whereas once upon a time our real national interests were clear and immediate and generally agreed upon, they are so no longer.

They put four hard challenges to the basic workings of our democratic system:

For one thing, if ever the line between domestic and foreign affairs could be drawn, it is now wholly erased. Whether we realize it or not, we can no longer assure ourselves that what we do in one place is unrelated to what we do in a second place; that if we slip domestically, the effect will not be felt abroad—or the other way around. The strength of the American economy, for example, enters directly as a factor in our power to build a versatile military establishment, or to export capital in ways that will contribute to the orderly growth of newly independent peoples. In a reverse view, if those people and their resources, along with those of our European allies should ever be drawn into the Communist orbit, it is difficult to see how we could for long maintain our present economy or, indeed, anything resembling our present way of life.

Second, because America's paramount strength has bested in us the role of leadership for a coalition diplomacy, our executive and legislative organs of government must bear two constituencies in mind. One is the voting constituency from which the chief officers of American Government draw their title of office. The second constituency begins at the 3-mile limit. It is formed by many hundreds of millions of people around the globe who, though they don't cast a single vote in any American election, are vitally affected by the decisions of American lawmakers.

Out of this, there arises a recurrent dilemma. In the event of a conflict of interest between the two constituencies, which one should have a prior claim on the support of the American lawmaker? If the prior claim is that of his nonvoting constituency, then he risks a repudiation by American voters. If the prior claim is that of his voting constituency, then he risks the loss of trust by the nonvoting constituency—whose support he must have if he is to attain what both constituencies want above all other things, namely, the conditions for a just peace.

Third, the very process of coalition diplomacy tends to exercise a gravitational pull that centers the business in the hands of the Executive, and downgrades the role of the Congress and the electorate as direct parties to the affair. For the Congress is simply not structurally equipped to deal simultaneously with all the day to day problems of coalition diplomacy. And the people, for their part are even less well equipped to follow the intricate twists and turns of any contemporary diplomatic transaction.

The fourth difference between the past and present represents so great an intensification of the old problem of amateur-expert relations in government, as to constitute an almost new problem. What I have in mind here, is the fact that many of our leading questions of foreign affairs nowadays, are entwined with infinitely complicated scientific and technological questions. For example, should we or should we not stop the testing of the hydrogen bomb? Should we put more or less effort into missile-launching submarinees or into the support of allied armies? You can search all the great treatises on the American polity from the Federalist papers on forward, and they will not give you a single clue to the right answer. Even that second great source of popular doctrine, "Poor Richard's Almanac," which is so much evoked today, also fails in this respect.

Public ignorance on these new-style political-scientific-military questions is widespread, to put it mildly, and reaches into high places, including the U.S. Senate. It is matched by the respect and awe we hold for the expert practitioners of these new arts—a respect which we do not accord experts in other fields. The economists of this country rarely, if ever, agree on precisely the monetary policy to be followed by the Federal Reserve Board. But this does not in the least inhibit people who don't know the difference between Adam Smith and John Maynard Keynes from expressing the most profound judgments on the matter. Yet these same people are quite willing to leave vastly more important questions to a handful of scientists and military strategists who sharply disagree among themselves.

One reason for this paradox, I suggest, is that whereas the economists carry on their disputes in public, what the military scientists have to say is funneled almost exclusively to the executive, where the cutoff stamp of top secret comes into play. But what is cut off simultaneously, is any real power by the people or the Congress to judge whether the agents of the Executive acted wisely or not on the basis of the word they alone were privileged to hear.

All these new challenges work in their own way to give a new sense of awesome relevance to what De Tocqueville had to say about the inherent difficulties a democracy faces in the conduct of contemporary foreign politics.

There is one more difficulty that deserves mention for it arises, paradoxically, from the effort of a democracy to respond to the new challenge. It has to do with the very nature of bipartisanship—in theory an instrument of national unity but more often in recent practice a gag on legitimate discussion. Time and again we have lately found ourselves in situations where the Executive, consulting itself, has announced a policy. Whereupon the cry goes out that it cannot be debated, since this would show the world that we are divided. What we must do, instead, is to swallow our doubts about the wisdom of the policy. We must rally to the Executive in a great show of national unity. Nor does the matter end there. Later on, when the doubtful wisdom of the policy becomes apparent in the formidable world of actual practice, the members of the opposition party are again silenced. For if they raise their voice, they invite the rebuke: "You voted for that policy when it was sent down here to the Congress. Why are you squawking about it now?"

I am not implying that anything and everything ought to be fair game for partisan politics. Far from it.

Foreign policy ought in fact to be nonpartisan or unpartisan—words which the late Senator Vandenberg preferred to bipartisan. Nonpartisanship means that policies are criticized and debated on their merits, not in a partisan electioneering context.

I would add but one more footnote to this. From what I have been able to judge of America's European allies, the thing they fear most is not a healthy debate conducted by Americans on foreign affairs issues. Their greater fears arise over precipitate announcements of foreign policy which neither Congress nor the country has properly considered.

If the difficulties I have been considering seem more acute in their American context, it is only because the blinding light of attention is focused on America in its role as the mainstay of the Western coalition. But if we shift the spotlight to any of the other leading democracies in this coalition, we get the impression of a single image repeating itself in various degrees, like an object seen in a hall of mirrors.

Today, for example, Europe is caught in the crisis for which the word "Berlin" stands as the graphic symbol. Each nation there looks at its neighbor, and all look at the United States with a sense of wonder whether all will stand together or fall separately in the event the Soviets mean to breach the peace. Yet on the occasion of the 10th anniversary of NATO recently observed in Washington, I asked myself why it was so necessary for one member after another to assure all the rest that he could be trusted to carry out the purpose of NATO? I asked myself why the speech given by Acting Secretary of State Christian Herter—the speech in which he merely repeated America's 10-year-old commitment to honor its NATO obligations—should have been considered the highlight of the anniversary? And I also wondered why the crisis over Berlin should have so menacing a face, and should have led to an uneasy feeling, which has even been voiced in some quarters, that we have already been defeated on the ground by the Soviets?

By any arithmetic test of potential strength, it is we who should be giving the Soviets sleepless nights and not the other way around. For if the population and the industrial resources of Europe and the United States were really mobilized to act in concert; and if that strength was translated into a military dimension, the aggregate would exceed by far anything the Soviets could muster in the foreseeable future. Think of it. The United States and its NATO allies constitute 433 million people organized in a highly industrialized power complex. The Soviet Union, with its problematic allies in Eastern Europe, can muster only 300 millions. Yet here we are, frightened by the present preponderance of the Soviet strength in conventional arms; and frightened also by the all too exact knowledge that a resort to nuclear arms under conditions of nuclear parity, might result in a dead Europe instead of the live one we all want to preserve.

How have we arrived at this incongruous position? Sometimes I wonder if we have correctly assessed the changed situation that now confronts us. It is true that at the end of the Second World War there may have been opportunity for choice in the methods of our foreign policy. By cold logic we could have taken the imperialist course. We had a monopoly of nuclear weapons. Indeed, we had shown that we were prepared to use them. It is conceivable that we could have pressed this temporary advantage to impose a dictated peace upon the Soviets, forcing their withdrawal within the Soviet perimeter. Instead we chose not to use the nuclear weapon as an instrument of policy, but to work in consort with our allies to build what we hoped would be a more durable peace.

Whatever the choices of the past, today we no longer have any choice. Today the nuclear weapon has no utility as an instrument of foreign policy. It cannot attain the objectives which lie beyond war. It can only ring down the last act curtain for us and our enemies alike.

Then why are we so tentatively committed to the only course that lies open to us? Why do we hesitate before the commitments of manpower and resources that can preserve the balance for the West? Why do we appear listless before a challenge that is so obviously demanding of our greatest energies?

Take the area of military strategy alone. Even before the Soviets attained their present nuclear position, it was perfectly apparent that our own atomic superiority was not a substitute for conventional forces. It was wholly clear that placing our entire reliance on these weapons would one day confront us with the choice of blowing up the world simply to contain the sort of probing operation the Russians use to test our will.

The founders of NATO realize this. Their first plans called for 90-plus divisions. And yet, as the countries of NATO have steadily prospered, their concept of what they can afford to do has steadily narrowed.

What has been missing is not the material capacity to support adequate conventional forces, but the will to do so. Our spirit, on both sides of the Atlantic, has gone soft.

Is it not ironical that the blaze of selfless idealism burned brightest in Europe and in America when the havoc of World War II still met the eye at every turn? In that hour, as I recall it, the cry went out from the best spirits among the victors and the vanquished alike for a new sense of fraternity, and for an end to the national divisions that twice led the flower of European youth to the slaughterhouse. The best spirits of Europe, as I recall, wanted to stand as one family, respecting the cultural diversity of their individual members, but united in the pursuit of a political destiny sought in common by all members.

And is it not ironical that as the rubble was swept from the streets of Europe; and as the signs of a progressively expanding prosperity rose where rubble once had been, the visions of a Europe twice united—within itself, and with its North American offshoot—grew progressively more cloudy? Here was a cause that should have enlisted the concentrated and sustained energies of the leaders and the led on both sides of the Atlantic. Instead, European leaders, fully as much as American leaders, began to think in terms of their voting constituencies, at the expense of their nonvoting constituencies. I deeply regret the recent recriminations between two of our chief NATO allies—recriminations that have been echoed all out of proportion in the popular press. Their differences, I suspect, arise not so much over substantive issues as over a sense of frustration at the lack of an energizing force that will give life to our alliances.

Now it is not my purpose, as the saying goes, to be a prophet of doom and gloom. I am merely saying that the choice facing European democracies was and is just this: Federate or perish. And the task facing America is to so conduct itself, that it will help nurture those tentative roots toward federation like Euratom and the Common Market that have managed to take hold—to nurture them with the object of creating a real European Union. Beyond that, our purpose must be to bring into being that system of interlocking commonwealths—to use Max Ascoli's apt phrase—that can bolster our security.

I know all about the vetoes practical men stand ready to catalog. I heard them in 1945, and the list has not changed one bit today. The only thing that has changed is the urgency of ignoring what practical men have to say. The march of history is fast outstripping us. Europe and America have enormous resources for survival, indeed for the mastery of any challenge hurled our way by the Soviets. But those resources will not be mobilized, they will remain in their present state of disarray, until public men and the publics on both sides of the Atlantic fit those resources into a grand design for closer union. In striving to bring this design to pass in our own time, we may make mistakes; but in striving, we may find our salvation. If we do not strive for it at all, our epitaph will read: "They chose to stand still, and so were lost forever."

NONPARTISAN FOREIGN POLICY

Senator FULBRIGHT has nicely dissected a sacred cow in discussion of foreign affairs. In his address yesterday to the American Society of Newspaper Editors, the new chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee punctured the notion that bipartisanship is the desirable objective in congressional consideration of foreign policy. Rather, said the Akansas Senator, there ought to be nonpartisan evaluation and criticism, meaning honest appraisal without thought of partisan advantage.

This has long needed to be said. True bipartisanship is difficult in a system of divided powers, and almost impossible when the political control of Congress is different from that of the executive branch, which has the responsibility for initiating and executing policy. Too often the ritualistic slogan of bipartisanship has been invoked to quell misgivings, muzzle criticism of mistakes or reduce matters to the lowest common denominator so as to satisfy all but the most extreme elements in either party. This is a semantic perversion of the purpose of consultation.

Whichever party is in control, thoughtful discussion—of existing assumptions as well as new positions—is essential to obtain wholehearted support. The lesson is as applicable to the Democrats as to the Republicans. It means, not license for interminable harangue, but a chance to talk out such issues as Quemoy or Berlin freely, without any inhibition that such discussion will be rocking the boat. As Mr. FULBRIGHT noted, the late Senator Vandenberg, who is often credited as the father of bipartisan foreign policy, preferred the word "nonpartisan." In 1950 Mr. Vandenberg gave a lucid description of what he meant as "a mutual effort, under our indispensable two-party system, to unite our official voice at the water's edge so that America speaks with maximum authority against those who would divide and conquer us and the free world. It does not involve the remotest surrender of free debate in determining our position. On the contrary, frank cooperation and free debate are indispensable to our ultimate unity. In a word, it simply seeks national security ahead of partisan advantage. Every foreign policy must be totally debated and the 'loyal opposition' is under special obligation to see that this occurs."

For the remainder, it is good to know that as chairman Mr. FULBRIGHT intends to focus on the long-range problem of adjustment of American policy and responsibility to the needs of an age of revolution and challenge from the Soviet Union, with especial emphasis on defining national interests and values. Others have spoken similarly of the need to put "less steel into tail fins and more into school construction," but the importance of this kind of philosophical maturity cannot be overstated. We think Mr. FULBRIGHT is entirely right.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. BUSH. I should like to say that the address to which the Senator from Montana has referred, delivered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT], before the American Society of Newspaper Editors, was, in my view, excellent. It contained some fine philosophy. I certainly commend it to all Senators for reading. I hope people throughout the United States will read it and realize the truth of what the distinguished Senator from Arkansas has said about what we have got to do if we are really going to face up to our responsibilities, as a world power, in this very dangerous day.

I commend the Senator from Arkansas highly for that speech. The speech was realistic. Often we fail to come to grips with problems which lie closer to home than we like to admit. I commend the Senator for his splendid address.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I appreciate what the Senator from Connecticut has said. I am sure the remarks he has made in support of the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, which will be incorporated in the RECORD, will carry great weight, not only in the Senate, but throughout the country as well.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I wish to express my appreciation to the Senator from Montana for his remarks and his action in inserting the two items in the RECORD, and also to the Senator from Connecticut for the kind remarks he has made. There is no one I would rather hear make such remarks than the senior Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas.

PERSONAL STATEMENT BY SENATOR FULBRIGHT—NOMINATION OF MRS. CLARE BOOTHE LUCE AS AMBASSADOR TO BRAZIL

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I rise to a point of personal privilege, and should like to address myself to it for a few moments.

I regret I was not on the Senate floor yesterday when the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] criticized—unfairly, in my opinion—the conduct of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and particularly of myself and the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MORSE], in regard to the hearing on the nomination of Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce to be Ambassador to Brazil. I had received no notice that the Senator from Arizona intended to make the remarks which appear on page 6087 of the RECORD.

I may say I sent notice earlier this morning to the office of the Senator from Arizona, stating I would reply to his criticism; but I have been informed he is out of town, which I regret.

The Senator from Arizona said:

> The senior Senator from Oregon and the junior Senator from Arkansas, who were leaders in the fight against the late Senator McCarthy, engage in what I believe to be the same tactics they accused Senator McCarthy of using.

Mr. President, I resent this comparison of the conduct of the Foreign Relations Committee with the behavior of McCarthy. This raises a very fundamental point; namely, the difference between legitimate criticism of a person's policies and an attack on his motives and his loyalty to his country. The junior Senator from Arizona fails to understand this distinction, just as the late Senator from Wisconsin failed to understand it.

The Senator from Arizona also questioned the pertinence of the inquiries directed to Mrs. Luce. They were, he said, "more in the nature of a political field day than in the nature of determining this lady's qualifications." This statement indicates the Senator fails to understand the nature of the qualifications an Ambassador should have.

The statements about which Mrs. Luce was questioned are directly relevant to the point of her judgment and objectivity. She herself admitted that the language she had used was "very intemperate" and that it was the kind of language "which good taste would prevent or should prevent the private citizen from using." It is quite clear to me—I regret it is not so clear to the Senator from Arizona—that temperateness and good taste are relevant to the qualifications of an Ambassador.

Finally, the Senator from Arizona declared that Mrs. Luce's services as Ambassador to Italy "have never been questioned, to my knowledge." Let me expand the realm of the Senator's knowledge. I ask unanimous consent that there be inserted in the RECORD at this point an article from the Reporter magazine of February 23, 1956, entitled "The Lady of Villa Taverna." I also ask that there be inserted an article from the same magazine of April 2, 1959, entitled "Instead of Orchids."

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Reporter Magazine, Feb. 23, 1956]

THE LADY OF VILLA TAVERNA

(By Claire Sterling and Max Ascoli)

Clare Boothe Luce, U.S. Ambassador to Italy for 3 years, will soon be coming home. She will be returning with the glow of success that usually surrounds this remarkable woman to face a public that has heard more about her than any ambassador in recent American history. She has frequently complained, during these 3 years, that Americans have been told too much about her and not enough, that she has been written about almost always as a woman, rarely as a serious diplomat. Since it is on her record as a diplomat that the public may soon be asked to judge her—for a Senatorship, a Cabinet post, possibly even the Republican Vice Presidential nomination—an account of that record is given here.

THE HARD WAY

The new ambassador got the full Neapolitan treatment for visiting celebrities when she stepped off the gangplank on April 22, 1953—flowers, guitars, boisterous crowds cheering under the warm sun of Naples. The Italian Foreign Ministry gave her an unctuous welcome in Rome. But it was no secret that the Italians resented her appointment.

What bothered the Italians was not simply that she was a woman. Accomplished as she was in many ways, everybody knew that she was coming to Italy not because she was peculiarly qualified for the post but because her husband had contributed powerfully to General Eisenhower's nomination and election.

The appointment, it is said, had been offered first to Henry Luce himself. If he turned it down in favor of his wife, the decision was reached after both had carefully considered her handicaps, which were many. Among them was the fact that she was his wife. While some Italians might cherish the prospect that the three big Luce magazines would acquire a vested interest in featuring Italy, many had qualms. "Luce once adopted China," a reporter in Italy remarked, "and look what happened to China." Apart from that, Mrs. Luce was beautiful—beautiful enough, even at the age of 50, to infuriate other women and embarrass her diplomatic colleagues. It might have been different had she looked like Gertrude Stein.

Also, she was a recently converted Catholic, too unrelaxed for Italy's ancient, comfortable Catholicism, too combative for a population which, if Catholic in religion, has a long tradition of anticlericalism in politics. She was an easy target for the Communists: rich, Republican, well known in leftist circles for "hating communism with an African passion," as Pravda put it—this in a country whose Communist strength represents one-quarter of the voters.

She was to find other handicaps as she went along. Her sharp tongue and wit did not suit her temperamentally for a diplomatic world peopled by the stuffed shirts she had once lampooned in a popular book of that name. Moreover, if she was untrained as a diplomat, she was well trained as a journalist. For a journalist, news has no value until it is published, while for a diplomat it is the other way around. Mrs. Luce is annoyed by the charge that she talks too much. "I don't really talk too much," she says, "but I'm widely misquoted." (Nevertheless, she has talked too much.) Furthermore, her appointment was political in intent as well as origin. Where a professional ambassador might have no greater dream than a bigger and better ambassadorship, her ambition has been frankly to "dramatize the dynamic new Eisenhower administration."

FROM THE MOMENT SHE ARRIVED

She has worked enormously hard, driven, as always, by a determination to prove herself on a man's level. "I come from a world," she had Miriam say in her celebrated Broadway hit, "The Women," "where a woman's got to come out on top—or it's just too damned bad."

She has filled 43 bound volumes with press clippings, some favorable, others not, but all testifying to her tireless energy. She has traveled thousands of miles up and down the peninsula, posed for thousands of photographs, made hundreds of speeches, and entertained almost everybody—not everybody, unfortunately—in the handsome Renaissance residence, Villa Taverna, provided by the U.S. Government. In her first year, more than 7,000 people signed the Villa Taverna's guest book; and during 1955 alone, she received several hundred Members of Congress. (Some might have driven her to despair if they had not provided her with priceless stories for conversational use. One wanted to know how Garibaldi got his elephants across the Alps, another what the Russians were doing behind the Urals, while a third once instructed her secretary to "Call me a plane.")

At times her sense of public relations has been superb. When an Italian LAI plane crashed at Idlewild a few days before she was to go home on leave, she canceled her flight with an American line and booked with LAI. When Prime Minister Alcide De Gasperi died in 1954, she rushed back from a summer vacation in the States for the funeral, causing the British Ambassador grudgingly to do likewise. When the Amalfi coast was struck by a flash flood, she flew to the scene to make a round of the hospitals, beating the President of the Republic by 24 hours.

Millions of Italians have come to know and admire her for these activities. But all this proves how vigorously she has applied herself to her ambassadorial job, not how successful she has been at it.

THE BOLT HAD BEEN SHOT

Mrs. Luce started out without the biggest advantage her predecessors had had; she could not promise the Italians much money. Where the United States had given Italy $2.8 billion in direct economic aid before she came, Italy got a net of $105 million in fiscal 1954, $45 million in 1955, and $5 million in the first quarter of 1956; and where mutual defense assistance offshore-procurement contracts had reached a total of $383 million during her first summer, they had slackened off to $91 million the next year, and $39.5 million the year after.

In effect, this meant a fast passage from proconsular to interallied diplomacy between two nations that in various degrees needed each other. More precisely, it meant trying to convince the Italians, using other means of persuasion than money, to do what the State Department was anxious for them to do: attain political and economic stability, support the Atlantic Alliance and the European Defense Community, roll back the biggest Communist Party this side of the Iron Curtain. Since most government leaders were already at least verbally inclined to do these things, it meant keeping them on the right path by exerting a discreet influence in Parliament and among the voters. Quite an undertaking for even a seasoned politician-diplomat, irrespective of sex.

THE 1953 ELECTIONS

She began badly. A month after her arrival and 2 weeks before the difficult elections of June 7, 1953, the Communist newspaper L'Unitá triumphantly caught her giving out crucifixes to a group of southern peasants during the inauguration of a land-reform village called La Martella. Crucifixes are customarily distributed in Italy on such occasions, but not by a U.S. Ambassador. A week later she got into worse trouble by saying publicly in Milan that any electoral victory for the extreme right or left would have "grave consequences for the intimate and friendly cooperation between Italy and the United States." Several Italian and American newspapers claimed later that the speech cost the center parties the election.

The charge was unfair. In saying what everyone knew, she probably did not change many votes, let alone the 57,600 by which the government coalition fell short of the total necessary to get the bonus seats the recent election law provided for. But the speech hurt her personally. She was making her maiden address as Ambassador, at a decisive moment in Italian politics, in the most politically literate city in Italy, before people who were waiting for her to fall on her face. (She told an Italian paper recently that she had not written the speech herself and that of the two aides who did, one is now stationed in Singapore and the other in South Korea. The disclosure may help explain away her first big mistake; it has not improved her staff relations.)

The elections that June opened a difficult era in Italy. Under De Gasperi's leadership for the 5 preceding years, the Christian Democrats and their minor partners—Republicans, Social Democrats, Liberals—had governed with a safe majority and comparative stability. After June 7, the center coalition had a margin of 16 seats in the Chamber of Deputies. On the left there was a bloc of 143 Communists and 75 leftwing Socialists. On the right there were 40 Monarchists and 29 Neo-Fascists. Short of holding new elections, which, as De Gasperi said, were "absolutely necessary and utterly impossible," the center parties had a choice of trying to carry on as they were or making a deal with either the left or right. While the politicians debated the question, the country had four different Prime Ministers within 8 months.

The idea of moving to the right, if not all the way to the Fascists then at least as far as their Monarchist allies, was being pushed hard during those months by several influential Italians: Luigi Gedda of Catholic Action; Don Luigi Sturzo, founder of the first Catholic popular party; Giuseppe Pella, who headed a Christian Democratic caretaker Cabinet at the time. The conclusion that a coalition of the right—eventually leading to some sort of constitutional monarchy—would turn popular opinion toward the left was finally reached by the most influential Christian Democratic leaders.

But not by the American Ambassador. She had made up her mind: Only by enlisting the Monarchists and strengthening the right wing of the Christian Democratic Party could Italy ever have a strong, stable government.

Although a newcomer to Italy, Mrs. Luce was neither unsympathetic nor unfamiliar with the outlook of the right. But she only knew the political right in her own country, the Republican Party that had just returned to power, and she had little notion of how weak, Bourbonic, and thoroughly unpopular the Italian right is. It is a haven not only for groups of jittery businessmen and landowners but also for unregenerate feudal barons, as well as former Fascist goons, crackpot young bombthrowers, fetish worshippers who once kidnaped Mussolini's corpse, and sophomoric nationalists who want to retrace the late Duce's military steps over the long African route to Ethiopia. Incidentally, it also includes many who despise Britain and hate the United States.

The Ambassador may not have liked all these people—her anti-Mussolini record was clearly established before the war—but she could never understand why the same reason of expediency that brought the United States to accept Franco as an ally could not apply also to Italian internal politics. Indeed, she had only scorn for those Italian Democrats—and there are many of them—who, if forced to choose between the right and the Communist left, would not hesitate to choose the Communists. Nor could she make out why the mere fact that she dealt with even the least objectionable rightists would render her objectionable herself. Mrs. Luce believed that only a firm anchorage to the right could stop the drift of Italian politics.

DULLES' FOOT

It was primarily in the hope of winning the rightist-nationalist support that Mrs. Luce worked so strenuously all during the summer of 1953 to get a settlement in Trieste. Italy's quarrel with Yugoslavia over this tiny free territory had offered both right and left a chance to discredit the Christian Democrats' Western-minded regime. If Italy were to get at least zone A, which included the port of Trieste, so she argued, the monarchists might be induced to rally around Pella's government.

The solution was announced on October 8, 1953, in the form of a joint American-British declaration giving zone A to Italy and zone B to Yugoslavia. It came after Mrs. Luce had wrangled with the British for months and gone over the State Department's head by sending her husband to the White House 3 days earlier. (The Secretary of State, more interested in Tito's military strength than Italy's political weakness, had said only a month earlier that he was openminded about alternatives to the Big Three's 1948 pledge to give Italy all of Trieste. As Mrs. Luce was to observe after several similar experiences, "Every time I open my mouth, Dulles puts his foot in it.")

The plan might have worked if Marshal Tito had not been left in the dark about it—because of American impatience to make the announcement, according to the British; because of a deliberate British oversight, according to our Ambassador. As it was, Tito moved his troops up to the zone A border and threatened war; Italy replied with angry demonstrations in nearly all its major cities; in Trieste itself, rioting left six dead. It was not until a year later, after Pella had fallen and Mr. Dulles had sent Robert D. Murphy as a special emissary to Rome and Belgrade, that a solution much like the original one was accepted by both sides.

Opinions differ as to how much credit Mrs. Luce deserves for this settlement. There are those, among them the authoritative Corriere della Sera of Milan, who give her most of the credit for the belated agreement. "No one will ever know," said the Corriere when the Italian flag went up over Trieste, "how much Italy owes to this fragile blonde creature." Others, including members of her staff, say that the settlement had been maturing for some years and that the October 8 declaration delayed it, if anything.

Whoever is right, Trieste did not bring the results she had hoped for. In fact, the end of the Trieste crisis deflated the nationalist boom, and from then on the rightists started losing ground. Even before the settlement came, Pella, who was thriving on that boom, had gone so far to the right that all of Italy's democratic forces compelled him to resign. For two things are clear about Italian postwar politics: First, the trend is to the left although not necessarily to the Communist left; second, all attempts to consolidate the right have failed. Unfortunately, the U.S. Ambassador could never quite manage to recognize the leftward trend of Italian politics and come to terms with it.

DIPLOMACY BY PRESS LEAKAGES

It had been a bumpy 8 months for the Ambassador when she came home for her first Christmas holiday, and the stories in the American press soon after she arrived led her into even greater trouble. On January 7, 1954, the New York Herald Tribune reported that the Italian Christian Democrats had actually won the bonus seats in the June elections, as revealed by a recount of most of the million voided ballots. It claimed the Rome politicians would publicly deny the facts, went on to question the constitutionality of all Italian Cabinets since that election, and declared that "Italy is now undergoing a dangerous political crisis which need never have happened." The same story, more or less embroidered with the notion that the Communists would take over in 2 or 3 years, was carried by nearly every major American newspaper, several syndicated columns, Newsweek and Time over the next few weeks, with particular emphasis on the recount (though no recount has been completed, or officially reported.)

There could be no question about the source. Mrs. Luce herself told a press conference in New York that the "democratic and republican forces" in Italy could still stop the Communist Party "when and if they want to," thereby attributing to Italian statesmen like De Gasperi a lack both of vision and of will.

(Almost 3 months later, Mrs. Luce was accused of having inspired all these stories by the progovernment Italian weekly L'Europeo, which published a purported account of her off-the-record talk with Washington correspondents at the Hotel Mayflower on January 5. She denied the account.)

It is hard to see what Mrs. Luce expected to gain from her alarmist campaign. La Stampa described it as a "shock tactic * * * needed by the U.S. Republicans for the forthcoming election" of 1954, and it may have served that purpose. In Italy, however, it caused bedlam. Assuming it were true, for instance, that the Christian Democrats had really won the majority necessary for the bonus seats—a claim never proved—what would they have gotten by holding a complete recount and claiming victory? Probably a civil war, since nothing less would be likely to unseat some 63 leftist Deputies in Parliament at that late date. Assuming also that the Communists were on the verge of power and the center parties were too flabby to hold them back, who would have been likely to gain by the Ambassador's revelations? Only the Communists. Certainly not the Christian Democrats, who, even as Mrs. Luce was talking at the Mayflower, were trying desperately to find a way out of the crisis brought about by Pella's fall.

Pella's resignation caused Mrs. Luce to cut her holiday short by 10 days and return to Rome. Shortly afterward, she invited leaders of the Republican, Social Democratic, Liberal, and Monarchist Parties to Villa Taverna for separate talks on the crisis. She had evidently hoped to line up these parties behind the new Christian Democratic candidate of the Premiership, Interior Minister Amintore Fanfani. The effort not only failed but exposed her to unprecedented attack, since consultations of this kind are the prerogative of the Italian Chief of State. The Communist leader, Palmiro Togliatti, described Mrs. Luce suavely in Parliament as an "old lady who brings bad luck to everything she touches."

While all this was going on, the New York Times broke the story that the United States had authorized its Ambassador to Italy to cancel all offshore procurement contracts with plants where Communist workers were in the majority, which was the case in most big Italian factories at the time. The announcement caused a furor. A spokesman for CISL, the predominantly Catholic labor federation, described the policy as "brutal blackmail"; the secretary of the other anti-Communist federation, UIL, added. "The point is not to punish workers by denying them work but to encourage them by providing it."

By the time Mario Scelba was confirmed as Prime Minister at the beginning of March 1954, Italo-American relations were scraping bottom. Mrs. Luce had no confidence in the center coalition that Scelba had pulled together again, and Italian politicians were criticizing her so openly that the State Department was reported by one press association as wondering "whether it is in the United States interest to have an Ambassador who is the object of so much public debate."

SCELBA WILL DO

The Scelba experiment, however, opened a better year for Mrs. Luce. With only the most lukewarm support from his own party, Scelba needed a friend badly, and the anti-Communist program he announced the month he became Premier met most of the objections Mrs. Luce had been raising all winter. His cabinet, he said, would crack down on the Communists in the civil service, throw them out of the Government-owned buildings and printing plants, prosecute them for slandering the Government, and curb the Communist-owned or controlled export firms that were trading with Red China. Since the Communists were too solidly embedded in Italy to be dug out so easily, only the easiest parts of this program were ever carried out. But as a token of intentions, the effort was appreciated in our Embassy. Slowly Scelba was gaining favor.

There were other onslaughts against the Communists during that year, which, to say the least, did not displease the Embassy. Prominent among them was a movement called Pace e Libertà (peace and liberty), led by Edgardo Sogno, a Foreign Office official who had been a hero of the resistance. The movement's purpose, as Sogno told the readers of his magazine, was to rally Italians around a national anti-Communist front, and it pursued this aim by publishing a string of shocking revelations about top Communist leaders, offering documentary evidence that many of them were once informers for Mussolini, that party bureaucrats rode to work in expensive custom-built cars, and that Togliatti, among others, kept a concubine draped in costly furs and jewels. The movement, which for a while was quite lively, has now petered out. As Ignazio Silone said: "The question isn't whether party leaders are scoundrels, but whether they are capable and effective scoundrels."

This question reveals why the Communist Party started to show the first signs of an erosion that is still going on. Mrs. Luce feels, and some people agree with her, that the psychological atmosphere created by Scelba, Sogno, and the American Embassy in 1954 was a major factor leading to the Communists' loss of Fiat in March 1955 and most big northern factories thereafter. While all three may have played some part, none of them could even remotely be compared to the part played by the Communists' own leaders, who had pressed too many workers too long to go out on too many protest strikes in obedience to Cominform diktats.

This is not to say that the offshore procurement policy, one of the Ambassador's most publicized endeavors at home, was insignificant. While anti-Communist union leaders have disowned the policy and still don't like it, they admit privately now that by canceling $25 million worth of contracts in two Communist-dominated plants the United States persuaded thousands of Italian workers to vote against the Communist-controlled CGIL (General Confederation of Italian Labor) in order to keep their jobs. Nobody will know until the next elections whether or not the political opinions of these workers have changed.

The ratification early in 1955 of the Paris pacts that replaced the ill-fated EDC was a genuine victory for Mrs. Luce, though it is hardly imaginable that Italy could have held out alone. But the really major achievement of the American Embassy was to have kept Mario Scelba in office 15 months. (One of the more painful things Mrs. Luce has suffered is the ingratitude of the politicians whom sooner or later she has come to befriend. If the Ambassador had not gone far beyond the call of duty to prop him up, Scelba would have fallen months before he did; yet he says now that "after all, a male Ambassador would have been better.")

Scelba's trip to Washington surely contributed to prolong his tenure in office. The invitation was extracted from a State Department made reluctant by its awareness that Scelba's cabinet was begining to spring leaks at every seam. But there was not even a hint of the irrepressible crisis in the American press when the Ambassador started home after Christmas. There has been "a remarkable improvement in the Italian picture" she told reporters. "Now there is a stable government * * * Italy has clarified its whole situation." Three months later, on the eve of Scelba's departure for the United States, he was to be humiliated by the proposal of a parliamentary injunction to limit his actions in the United States, forcing a ninth vote of confidence.

THE OIL LURE

The problem of Italian oil had become a stormy political issue by that time. Promising deposits had been found, first in Sicily, then in the Abruzzi, and an antiquated Fascist law still on the books was keeping most of the oil underground. The draft of a new law, written several years earlier by lawyers of American oil concerns in collaboration with the then Minister of Industry, Malvestiti, which offered considerable advantages to foreign companies, had been bottled up in parliamentary committee; and the group opposing it, led by the head of the state natural-gas monopoly, Enrico Mattei, was becoming stronger with every new sign that the deposits were very substantial indeed.

The American oil companies quarrel with Mattei had taken an ugly turn that summer when Fortune magazine, followed later by Time, pointed a finger at him as the biggest single obstacle to large-scale American investment in Italy. Apart from the merits of the case—and there were many on both sides—the fact that the publisher of Fortune and Time was also the U.S. Ambassador's consort led many Italians to consider this as semiofficial American pressure. They were already suspicious because of persistent rumors leaking from Government headquarters to the effect that the State Department was holding out on any further financial aid to Italy "until this oil business is settled."

Then Mrs. Luce herself entered the picture. Her first statement in the New York Times in January 1955 did not attract much notice. She repeated it in essence a few weeks later, however, in an interview given to Il Globo, the financial daily owned by Confindustria (the Confederation of Italian Manufacturers). Pointing out that "capital comes where the profit is greatest," and that "political security is associated with economic convenience," she went on to say: "Much depends on the oil policy of the Italian Government. It is known that oil investments are a good index of the security and profitable nature of the market. Many private companies can be led to invest their capital here if they see the oil companies doing it."

Her interview brought the long-smoldering dispute to an uproarious blaze. Shortly thereafter the Socialist Party introduced a motion in Parliament requiring Scelba's pledge that he would not discuss oil on his American visit. The motion did not pass. But the Christian Democrats forced the Premier to give Parliament a moral commitment along the same lines. What Scelba talked about in Washington is still, and probably will remain forever, a deep secret, but certainly he kept mum about oil.

As everybody in Italy knew, Scelba had gone to Washington mostly for the ride. He brought back the promise of 10 tons of heavy water for atomic experiment, a routine agreement ending double taxation of American businesses in Italy and vice versa, five honorary degrees, and a model of the Empire State Building in silver. But that was not enough to bring him past the last deadline his party had set; the election of a new chief of state.

THE GRONCHI ENIGMA

The election of Giovanni Gronchi as President of the Republic at the end of last April was the final blow for Scelba, and Mrs. Luce's most bitter personal defeat. As a left-wing Christian Democrat and an uncompromising enemy of Scelba and Fanfani, Gronchi was opposed vigorously by both, and it was partly but not exclusively because these two men opposed him that more than a hundred disaffected Christian Democratic Members of Parliament joined in a weird coalition with the Right and extreme Left to elect him.

Mrs. Luce, who had met Gronchi only once, considered him a pro-Communist who would steer Italy toward a neutralist foreign policy and bring the fellow-traveling Nenni Socialists into the Government. Only from his behavior in office will we ever learn whether, or to what extent, Mrs. Luce's judgment was correct. But certainly her behavior during the presidential contest can scarcely be called correct or wise. The American correspondents who were summoned to lunch at Villa Taverna the day before the fourth and final ballot came away thoroughly persuaded that Gronchi's election would mean disaster.

The same conviction was expressed by Lodovico Benvenuti, then Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, on whom the Ambassador had evidently borne down with all the influence of the Government she represented. Before the fourth ballot, Benvenuti told a packed and riotous Christian Democratic caucus that Gronchi's election "would end a 10-year friendship with the United States and force the State Department to review Italy's role in the whole network of European defense." An angry roar answered him and on the fourth ballot Gronchi was elected. A prominent Cabinet minister called Gronchi's election "the American Embassy's masterpiece."

The Ambassador was in the diplomatic gallery when the vote on the final ballot was being counted. As it became apparent that Gronchi had won, but before the result was announced, she walked out.

It was 3 weeks before Mrs. Luce paid her first courtesy call on the new President—the British Ambassador had made his the day after the election. In the meantime, the American press showed how deeply her apprehension had affected U.S. reports from Italy. On May 17, the New York Times in a dispatch from Rome said: "Recent political developments in Italy have convinced U.S. military authorities of the need for a review of Italy's position regarding the West, particularly NATO. * * * The dispatch added: "Doubts about Italy's present attitude have been created by the election of Giovanni Gronchi * * * and by events since. President Gronchi has always inclined toward neutralism and never shown any enthusiasm for the Atlantic Alliance. * * * In his inaugural speech he made no secret of his belief that room should be made in the Government for fellow-traveling leftwing Socialists if not for the Communists themselves." There were not quotes to back up this statement.

On the same day and in the same paper, however, a dispatch from Washington said: "Officials of the State Department * * * saw no particular need for a review of U.S. policy toward Italy"; and the same dispatch quoted a Pentagon spokesman as saying "he had heard nothing suggesting [such] a review."

Several more weeks were to pass before the Times' and other papers' Rome correspondents came around to a more temperate view, and it was 6 months before the State Department in a move toward reconciliation invited the new President to visit America.

Things have changed in Italy since the events of last May. Scelba's successor as Premier, Antonio Segni, is as pro-Western as the Premiers before him. But his relations with the American Embassy are cool, and his Cabinet has come to rely more on leftist support than any in the last 8 years. His two major accomplishments since being sworn in—the establishment of a constitutional court and the reform of the tax system—would have been impossible without Communist and Socialist votes. Embassy officials do not blame Gronchi for this situation, or Segni himself, who is the most moderate of Christian Democratic leftwingers. The responsibility lies mostly with the secretariat of the Christian Democratic Party, which has not yet succeeded in providing the party machine it is supposed to run with adequate discipline, purposefulness, and money.

There is a strange limpness in Italian politics today which affects both the Christian Democrats and the Communists, while the minor parties, right or left of center, are getting increasingly feeble. Among the political leaders the only one whose stock keeps rising is Pietro Nenni, who registers the uninterrupted leftward drift of the nation.

WRONG BETS

This, by and large, is the record of what has happened in Italy in the 3 years since Mrs. Luce arrived to carry out the dynamic policies of the Republican administration.

Of course nothing could be more absurd than to hold Mrs. Luce responsible for everything that has gone wrong with Italian democracy during the last 3 years. She could not have foreseen the weakening of Alcide de Gasperi's hold on his party after the 1953 election, not to speak of his death a year later. Even so, it would have been the better part of wisdom to consider that De Gasperi's matchless skill in keeping an ever-changing, precarious balance within his party as well as within the democratic coalition could some day run into a very serious snag, and that—after all—he was not immortal. And how can Mrs. Luce be blamed for having failed to foresee that the vaunted relaxation of international tension would ultimately, under Communist management, result in a relaxation of tension between the Communist and anti-Communist forces in the internal politics of the major European democracies?

But it is not unfair to hold Mrs. Luce responsible for having stubbornly held her rightward course, and for having guessed wrong too many times. For a politician, that is the capital sin. A politician she was before going to Italy, and a politician she will most probably be again when she comes home. A politician she was in all her persistent concern with Italian domestic affairs. There is nothing reprehensible about this concern: In our day and age a U.S. ambassador must play a sustained yet discreet role in the domestic policies of an allied country. What is reprehensible is to have backed those among the democratic politicians who because of their rightist inclinations were bound to lose ground. Either luck or skill failed Mrs. Luce.

To her credit, she never spared herself, never was slack in her job, never shunned taking chances and assuming responsibilities. She drove herself and her Embassy at a merciless pace, with an energy that few could rival, let alone surpass.

Most of her mistakes came from overdoing, from showing her hand and playing it too heavily in many cases where she might have succeeded had she been firm and discreet. Frequently she chose to be shrill and hard, while she could easily have achieved her goal just by quietly turning on a little bit of that charm with which she is so eminently endowed.

For instance, like many other people, American or non-American, she may have had good reason to dislike "The Blackboard Jungle," and to eliminate that controversial movie from the Venice Film Festival. But this was no excuse for her being so carried away by anger as to tell Ottavio Croze, the director of the festival, that if there was juvenile delinquency in America, it could be blamed largely on narcotics that came from Italy.

On other occasions, she preferred to exhibit a sort of girlish pettiness rather than face with quiet forbearance situations not to her liking. So, for instance, when Eleanor Roosevelt spent 4 days in Rome last spring, the U.S. Ambassador invited about 40 guests to meet her at an elaborate luncheon. All but a few were from the Embassy. Not a single Italian of the many eager to pay their respects to that truly great American woman was invited or, for that matter, offered a chance to meet her.

According to the people present, however, the luncheon turned out to be a triumph for Mrs. Roosevelt. The guests, particularly the younger ones, were so taken with her, so anxious to hear her talk, that the Ambassador had no choice but to let the party go on and on, while looking nervously at her watch.

MR. AND MRS.

Her fretful impatience and poor judgment contributed heavily to the failure of Mrs. Luce's mission to Rome. Perhaps part of the responsibility should go to Mr. Luce, who has spent half his time in Rome, working strenuously to make his wife's mission a success. His circle of friends was made up of the most typical representatives of Italian big business, men who can scarcely voice Italian feelings and needs. As things turned out, it was not advantageous to have two ambassadors for the price of one. Both Mrs. and Mr. Luce found it difficult, if not altogether impossible, to realize—hardened by success as they are—that the fight against communism just cannot be conducted on the Seven Hills the way it is conducted from Rockefeller Center.

In fact, on more than one occasion Mr. Luce did not conceal his dismay at what seemed to him the Vatican's softness toward Italian and international communism. His wife has been more reserved, and has managed to avoid too close contacts with the Catholic hierarchy, as she promised to do before going to Italy. She has been Ambassador to the Italian Republic, not to the Vatican.

At least once her fretfulness got on the nerves of the highest Vatican officials. This was last summer, when that saintly and rather erratic man, Mayor Giorgio La Pira, of Florence, attended the World Mayors' Conference, in Rome. Photographs of Elia Cardinal Dalla Costa, Archbishop of Florence, bowing over the hand of Moscow's mayor, greatly incensed the U.S. Ambassador. She let it be known at the Vatican's Secretariat of State that the Vatican's failure to curb La Pira, whom she held responsible, made the U.S. Ambassador wonder whether the church could still be considered an effective bulwark against communism; perhaps the United States was the only bulwark left. The Papal Secretariat of State did not find this outburst to its liking. The Vatican has lost none of its centuries-old skill in handling its saints, and it knows how to wait for the fall of great empires, be they secular or journalistic.

"THE SNAKE PIT"

Perhaps Mrs. Luce's mission to Rome would have achieved different results if this extraordinary woman whose public relations are usually matchless were equally adept at human relations. She certainly could have made better use of her staff if she had not so overawed the Foreign Service people under her command as to lead too many of them into thinking that the thing to do was to tell her what she wanted to hear. (Her Embassy became known as "the snake pit.")

She might have been spared many costly errors if she had had the patience to listen—particularly to those Italians who are friends of the United States rather than panderers to it. But somehow she has failed to surround herself with a large and representative Italian constituency. She certainly has met many kinds of Italians, but, at least at present, her most familiar milieu is a small coterie of professional wits and punsters. She got bored with the old aristocracy and disillusioned by the many Italian politicians panting after subsidies for their hard-pressed factions or parties. The heavily earnest and moralistic men who are striving to keep some integrity in the maze of Italian politics may occasionally offer pearls of wisdom, but in general they are not fun to be with.

The punsters who have become habitués of the Villa Taverna are fun. They write in a magazine, Il Borghese, that never mentions democracy without a chuckle or a sneer. Their wit, well appreciated not so long ago at the courts of Mussolini and Ciano, has lost none of its sharpness in the change of political régime, and it is not likely to be dulled by moralism ever.

After all, not so long ago Ambassador Luce was a playwright and an editor of Vanity Fair. Political success has not spoiled her wit, just as the passing of time has not altered her looks. She is as sprightly as ever, with a kind of inexhaustible vitality, constantly wound up. There is a sort of a strident, metallic quality about her, revealed in the high pitch of her voice.

Perhaps she has failed in Italy precisely because of her strong points—brightness and shrewdness and dash. The fact is that all these flowers, some bright and innocent, some sweetly poisonous, and all of them beautiful, have been growing on Italian soil for centuries and centuries. In Italy they are a drug on the market.

[From the Reporter magazine, Apr. 2, 1959]

INSTEAD OF ORCHIDS

The nomination of Clare Boothe Luce as Ambassador to Brazil has been hailed by the press as singularly felicitous, and even newspapers occasionally critical of the administration, like the Washington Post, have joined the chorus. For, it is said Mrs. Luce was an extraordinarily successful Ambassador to Italy—a view contested only by those who know the facts.

The facts, unfortunately, are sad. Mrs. Luce, from the moment she arrived in Rome, tackled her job with relentless energy. She was ever-present, even when the presence of the American Ambassador implied some physical danger. She plunged into Italian politics, and made unmistakably clear which politicians she liked and which she didn't. She overacted, overtalked, and oversmiled. She never spared herself in playing her role but missed all the cues.

This was a great pity, for her intentions were of the best. Her two predecessors, James Dunn and Elsworth Bunker, had brought to bear the overwhelming political influence and economic assistance of the United States with consummate skill. They had the actual power of proconsuls but they behaved like Ambassadors. Mrs. Luce, at a time when Italy was fast recovering, chose to behave like a proconsul. The result was that whenever she decided to go all out against a certain politican, that politician was made. Unfortunately, this is the way some politicians were made who are still most powerful in Italy and most inclined to stray from the path of the Atlantic Alliance. We have in mind, of course, men like Enrico Mattei and President Gronchi.

Toward the end of her mission Ambassador Luce was thoroughly worn out. "Worst of all, for a diplomat," as Time reported, "she had become irritable." The cause, Time said, was arsenic fallout. Then the curtain fell on what Broadway calls a turkey.

Now this remarkable woman is being sent to another faction-ridden Latin country. If her Italian record is any guide, she will soon be in Brazilian politics up to the hilt. Next year a president is to be elected and passions already are high in the country of the Western Hemisphere that is second only to us in population and vigor.

In the last issue of the Reporter we published Adolf Berle's review of "New World in the Tropics," by Gilberto Freyre, one of the most eminent sociologists of our times and a true friend of the United States. Freyre is alarmed at the mounting Yankeephobia in Brazil. "It is time now for the United States to have an exceptionally able Ambassador in Rio de Janeiro," he writes.

If the administration is still insistent on paying tribute to Mrs. Henry Luce with ambassadorships rather than with orchids, we don't see why she should not be sent to less critical countries. Given her Roman record, Ambassador Luce might well go to a capital where America's influence is not a major controversial issue, where the political order has been established for centuries, and where American newsmagazines are not taken too seriously.

We would suggest a monarchy for Mrs. Luce, whose court she would greatly adorn. It could be Britain, first and best of all, or, if President Eisenhower doesn't want to go that far, Luxembourg.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I might add, Mr. President, that the Committee on Foreign Relations has received a considerable volume of correspondence protesting the Luce nomination, some of it on the grounds of her service in Italy. I shall not place this correspondence in the RECORD, because it comes from private individuals, and I do not want to embarrass any of them in any way.

I am not now commenting on the merits of the criticisms which have been directed against Mrs. Luce's service in Rome. I am merely emphasizing the fact that evaluations of her service there were not all paeans of praise, contrary to the statement of the Senator from Arizona.

One of the statements about which the Senator from Oregon and I questioned Mrs. Luce was to the effect that President Franklin Roosevelt had "lied us into war." It happens that Franklin Roosevelt is an extremely popular—even a revered—figure in Latin America. It also happens that among the many allies we had in World War II was Brazil, and Brazil was more than an ally in name. Brazil not only made available important bases bordering on the strategic South Atlantic and the air route to Africa; she also sent a division of troops to Italy to help in that difficult and important campaign. Brazilians, as well as Americans, died in World War II. If the United States was lied into war, then Brazil was lied into war, as well. I expect that many Brazilians, as well as many Americans, will resent that charge. All of this is relevant to Mrs. Luce's qualifications to be Ambassador to Brazil.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I do not consider that either the committee or I went beyond proper bounds in our questioning of Mrs. Luce. I do consider that the Senator from Arizona went beyond proper bounds in his criticism. Rule XIX provides that "no Senator in debate shall, directly or indirectly, by any form of words impute to another Senator or to other Senators any conduct or motive unworthy or unbecoming a Senator."

The Senator from Arizona said the Senator from Oregon and I used the same tactics as the late Senator McCarthy, who was censured by the Senate for conduct unbecoming a Senator. This is the same thing as saying that the Senator from Oregon and I have used tactics unbecoming Senators.

I repeat, I resent this, and I hope that in the future the Senator from Arizona will address his remarks to the merits of issues rather than to the motives of Senators.

STEP-BY-STEP APPROACH TO A CONTROL BAN ON TESTING OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to proceed for 8 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Idaho? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, earlier this week, on Monday, the United States, with the support of the United Kingdom, announced a most significant change in our policy concerning the negotiations at Geneva to end nuclear weapons testing. Following an Easter recess, Ambassador James J. Wadsworth, our delegation leader, offered the Soviet Union a step-by-step approach to a control ban on all testing of nuclear weapons.

The first step calls for an internationally controlled suspension of tests in the atmosphere and underwater. It would leave for later the inclusion of underground and high altitude explosions.

Ambassador Wadsworth made it clear to the Soviet Union that the United States preferred an immediate agreement suspending all tests under trustworthy international controls. The step-by-step approach was suggested only because of the adamant Soviet objections to the kind of controls, including on-site inspection, which are reasonably required adequately to detect underground explosions.

In making this proposal, Mr. President, the United States and the United Kingdom have taken the initiative in an effort to break the stalemate at Geneva. The new offer, if accepted, would furnish a start toward a total ban by the agreement to end tests in the atmosphere and underwater. These are the tests causing the fallout which is corrupting the air. A ban upon them can be readily policed under a relatively simple international control and detection system which cannot possibly do any internal mischief within any of the countries concerned. Once established, such a control system would afford the present nuclear powers a functioning apparatus within which to harness the on-coming countries that are fast developing atomic capacities of their own. Moreover, the successful operation of such a control system might easily pave the way for its expansion to embrace a broader test ban encompassing all types of nuclear tests in space and underground.

Mr. President, I congratulate the administration and the State Department for making this proposal. I am gratified that it conforms in almost every detail with the suggestion I made to the State Department last February when I sent to the Acting Secretary of State, Christian A. Herter, a letter on this subject.

I told the Secretary that I hoped the United States would make one final effort to salvage something, for humanity's sake, from the long labors which brought us to the conference tables at Geneva. I said:

As a last resort, in order that the conference might not break up accomplishing nothing, I would strongly urge that the United States make this final proposal: an agreement to suspend all further nuclear tests in the earth's atmosphere, enforced through an international control system sufficient to detect any violations. Such a proposal would exclude, for the present, any agreement involving suspension or control of subterranean or extra-atmospheric nuclear explosions, neither of which contribute to the pollution of the air, the principal cause of so much world concern.

I ask unanimous consent that the full text of my letter be included in the RECORD at this point, along with the Acting Secretary's response of March 4, in which he advises me that the suggestion I have made is under study.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEBRUARY 25, 1959.

Hon. CHRISTIAN HERTER,
Acting Secretary of State,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The fateful negotiations now in progress in Geneva are being watched by an anxious world. The United States is once again demonstrating its good faith. We properly seek the suspension of all types of nuclear tests under a trustworthy international system of inspection and control.

I address this letter to you out of grave concern that Russia's continued intransigence may soon stalemate the negotiations at Geneva, causing our best efforts there to come to nought.

It is my understanding that the current difficulty at Geneva centers upon the following aspects of the Russian position:

(1) The Soviet demand for reserving a veto power over the operations of the proposed international control commission.

(2) The Soviet insistence that control posts be self-operated, that is, managed by nationals of the governments within whose territories the posts are located.

(3) The Soviet advocacy of procedure that would easily frustrate prompt action by the commission in dispatching inspection teams to make necessary on-the-spot investigations of subterranean disturbances suspected of being nuclear in nature, or of preventing these essential at-site investigations from occurring at all.

Obviously, unless the Russian attitude toward these matters changes, no reliable inspection and control system, capable of policing the suspension of all types of nuclear tests, is possible. Thus the Geneva negotiations are threatened with impending failure, one that might well foreclose our last hope for progress in this critical field.

If the conference fails in its objective to establish a workable international control system that could end all further nuclear tests, the responsibility for that failure will be clearly Russian. But if such an eventuality cannot be avoided, I would hope that the United States might make one final effort to salvage something, for humanity's sake, from the long labors that have brought us to this conference table.

As a last resort, in order that the conference might not break up accomplishing nothing, I would strongly urge that the United States make this final proposal: an agreement to suspend all further nuclear tests in the earth's atmosphere, enforced through an international control system sufficient to detect any violations. Such a proposal would exclude, for the present, any agreement involving suspension or control of subterranean or extra-atmospheric nuclear explosions, neither of which contribute to the pollution of the air, the principal cause of so much world concern.

I would anticipate that certain questions will be raised as to this proposal. Within the context in which I make it, I believe them to be answerable.

For example, it may be urged that, technically speaking, no international control system is required for the detection of atmospheric nuclear explosions. American, English, and Soviet technicians, all functioning at home, may now be able to detect the fact of nuclear explosion anywhere in the atmosphere, and determine much concerning it. Nevertheless, the commencement of an international control system to accomplish this objective is the sine qua non of man's progress toward any feasible disarmament. Broadened nuclear testing controls, to be sought in the future, and eventual inspection for prevention of surprise attack, are but milestones on the road to this goal. It is altogether probable that advancement here will come, if at all, only a step at a time. My proposal would be the first step, and the Geneva Conference may yet constitute the best opportunity left to take it. An international control system which functions, however limited its initial scope might be, is the urgent need.

Another objection to be anticipated is that this proposal is a futile one, in that the Russian behavior at Geneva makes it apparent that the Soviet Union does not really intend to agree to anything acceptable to the United States and Great Britain. It may be urged that the same considerations which have prevented agreement within the framework of existing negotiations would apply equally to my proposal.

This may prove to be the case, but not necessarily so. Soviet spokesmen, from Khrushchev down, have repeatedly expressed their fears and suspicions concerning the movement of foreign inspection personnel within Russia. Under the control system I propose, the necessity for this movement should be largely, if not entirely, eliminated. Fewer control stations would be required, and fewer foreign nationals would need to be stationed in the countries involved. In any event, it would seem that we ought not anticipate failure as a reason for abandonment of new proposals, even before making them.

Finally, it may be urged that the Russians might seize upon such a proposal as evidence to bolster the charge that the United States did not really support an ending of all nuclear tests, and so, somehow, to absolve Russia from their blame for failure to reach agreement. The answer to this, I think, is that the Russians, in any case, will contrive to blame the United States for a breakup of the conference. Whatever occurs, their indictment of us will be artfully drawn and made to sound plausible. In some quarters, they will be believed, regardless of what the truth may be, or what we may say about it. But this prospect should not be permitted to govern our decisions as to the course we must take.

In making these decisions, Mr. Secretary, I am sure you would be the first to agree that we are accountable, in the last analysis, to the trust we hold. It will be upon our conscience always, if we do less than the utmost in our quest to salvage something of value from the conference table at Geneva.

Sincerely,

FRANK CHURCH,
U.S. Senator.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 4, 1959.

The Honorable FRANK CHURCH,
U. S. Senate.

DEAR SENATOR CHURCH: Thank you for your thoughtful letter of February 25, 1959, about the Geneva nuclear test negotiations. The support you express for the U.S. position in Geneva is gratifying. We continue to feel, as you do, that we must press the Soviet Union on the control issues you outlined so that we may if at all possible achieve a suspension of all types of nuclear tests under a trustworthy system of international control and inspection.

The Department of State has been giving active consideration to what might be done should it prove, despite all of our efforts, that the Soviet Union will not accept the controls necessary to monitor a complete suspension of nuclear tests. The suggestion you have made, among others, is under study. you will appreciate that many technical factors must be assessed before a final decision can be reached.

In view of your interest in this problem I have asked Mr. Philip J. Farley and members of the Department's disarmament staff to keep you advised of the progress of our consideration of the matter you have raised.

With warmest regards,

Most sincerely,

CHRISTIAN A. HERTER,
Acting Secretary.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, in order to make public the proposal and for the purposes of completing the chronology of events, I also ask unanimous consent that the full text of the address I made to the Senate on March 2, be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE GENEVA CONFERENCE: A PROPOSAL FOR THE 11TH HOUR

PART I. THE PSYCHOSIS OF CRISIS

Mr. President, the 2 years I have served in the Senate are but a brief interlude in the life of a nation. Yet these years seem a very long time, perhaps because they have been burdened with unrelenting crisis. I came here in the wake of the Suez crisis. It was only being laid to rest, when revolt in Budapest turned our minds to Hungary. We were still tormented by the anguish there when sudden eruption in Iraq spurred us to dispatch our troops to Lebanon, and to switch our attention once again to another crisis in the Middle East. Then, hard upon this anxiety, we were suddenly confronted with a grave new crisis in the Orient, as the Chinese Communists commenced to cannon the offshore islands of Quemoy and Matsu, and the issue of war or peace hung in breathless balance over the Formosan Strait.

This afternoon, Mr. President, we are fixed upon the latest crisis to be provoked by the Communists, one that seems now to involve the fate of Berlin. We stare in cold fascination at the swinging pendulum of the clock that ticks off the hours, moving us ever closer to the 27th day of May, the deadline of the Soviet ultimatum.

Will there be war? we ask. Is this not the same question we asked ourselves, again and again, at Suez, at Lebanon, and at the Straits of Formosa?

Will there be war at Berlin? Only the men in the Kremlin hold the answer. Thus far they have been content with their war of nerves. The instigation of crises has been their method, as we have been catapulted from one to another, around the periphery of the free world. To be sure, 9 years ago the fighting came in Korea, but it was precipitated by Communist China, not the Soviet Union. Russia has not yet ventured a shooting war.

And there is good reason to doubt that Russia intends a shooting war over Berlin. It is much more likely, Mr. President, that somehow the Berlin crisis will abate, and a few months from now our concentration will have been shifted to a newly contrived crisis, possibly in Finland or Iran.

The mischief is that we may become, in our frantic ride from brink to brink, transfixed upon the chasms below, and unmindful of the road ahead. So, I fear, we are about to forsake the conference at Geneva, now approaching its 11th hour. We seem to view Geneva as through the wrong end of a telescope, even as we magnify Berlin. One would think that the cessation of nuclear tests, properly policed, was a matter of distant interest and little consequence to the people of the world.

It is not so.

The conference at Geneva is engaged upon what could easily be the most important work occurring anywhere in the world today or tomorrow.

PART II. GENEVA, THE REASONS FOR HOPE

Last October we went to Geneva in good faith and with stout hope. The prayers of the peaceful have attended our deliberations there, ever since. We went to Geneva to seek an end to all further nuclear tests, through an agreement among the three nuclear powers, the United States, the United Kingdom, and the Soviet Union. The treaty sought had two objectives, tied inseparably together: (1) All signatories would agree to suspend further nuclear tests, within the framework of (2) a trustworthy international system of inspection and control, to safeguard each party against any violation by another.

There were reasons, Mr. President, why we could hold stout hope for success at Geneva. In the first place, the formula for a technically sufficient inspection and control system had been given us. At an earlier conference in Geneva last summer, the scientists and technicians of all three countries had agreed upon the structure of the technical system required. Thus a single blueprint had been furnished in advance.

In the second place, there seemed to be at least one fundamental interest held in common. Americans, Englishmen, and Russians all breathe the same air. Radioactive fallout in the earth's atmosphere is poison for us all. If nuclear tests go on unchecked, the dose will gradually become more lethal. We shared a mutual interest in suspending further national tests, while the establishment of international controls afforded us, at once a method for confining nuclear explosions for peaceful purposes within safe limits, and a functioning apparatus within which to harness other countries, as they developed nuclear capacities of their own.

Finally, we had reason to hope for success at Geneva, because the suspension of nuclear tests appeared to be compatible, if action were taken now, with the national security interests of each of the negotiating powers. The agreement sought would not restrict the continued manufacture or stockpiling of atomic weapons by either side. Since the technology of nuclear weaponry, in the United States and the United Kingdom, on the one hand, and in the Soviet Union, on the other, had reached a state of relative balance, the agreement sought would not jeopardize the military position of any of the signatories, with respect to one another.

These were the compelling reasons, Mr. President, why it looked as though we had at last found common ground, making agreement possible. So we went to Geneva with our hearts full of hope.

PART III. GENEVA, THE REASONS FOR THREATENED FAILURE

Four months have passed. The Geneva Conference is deadlocked. The British Prime Minister, Mr. Macmillan, has gone to the Soviet Union, there to plead with Mr. Khrushchev to end the Russian intransigence that now threatens the conference with impending failure. Our bleak situation, as of now, is well summarized by Mr. Chalmers M. Roberts, in an excellent article that appeared in the Washington Post on Sunday, February 22, 1959. I ask unanimous consent that this article may appear in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"GENEVA TALKS HINGE ON MACMILLAN'S BID

"(By Chalmers M. Roberts)

"The Geneva nuclear test ban negotiations with the Russians are expected to collapse unless British Prime Minister Harold Macmillan can talk Nikita Khrushchev into modifying his demand for a veto.

"Philip J. Farley, special assistant to Secretary of State John Foster Dulles for disarmament and atomic energy, flew to Geneva over the weekend to see whether there was any purpose of keeping the talks going. Macmillan reached Moscow yesterday for his talks with Soviet Premier Khrushchev.

"It is not clear whether President Eisenhower personally has agreed to break off the talks unless there is a last-minute switch in the Soviet position. But those who should know indicated yesterday the United States is ready to recess the talks. For all practical purposes that would kill the test ban negotiations.

"Put onus on Soviets

"American officials have publicly put the onus for the Geneva deadlock on the Soviet Union. In turn, Khrushchev has charged that the United States and Britain want such a free-wheeling inspection and control system that it amounts to espionage inside Russia.

"The test ban talks began October 31 and have been going on ever since except for a Christmas holiday break.

"The United States and Britain have made a number of concessions to the Russians but they have insisted that inspection teams in each nation be composed almost entirely of nationals of other nations. The Russians have offered to have four or five foreign nationals at each station inside the Soviet Union. But they also have demanded what amounts to a veto over the movement of inspection teams which might want to investigate any suspicious activity which could be a clandestine test.

"On Friday the chief Soviet delegate at the Geneva meeting, now in its 14th week, charged the West with misrepresenting Russia's position. The West believes the four or five foreigners proposed by the Russians would be without real authority and could not keep adequate check on the 30 or so Soviet technicians expected to man each control post in the Soviet Union.

"Under renewed attack

"The American test ban offer recently has been under renewed attack within the Eisenhower administration by both Pentagon and Atomic Energy Commission officials. The offer was made by the President over AEC objections last summer on Dulles' advice.

"Dulles and the President took the position that, all political and military factors considered, the United States had to make the offer in part because of the worldwide fear of radioactive fallout. This view has had strong, but not unanimous, support from scientists who believe a test ban actually would be more favorable to the United States because of an American lead in many nuclear weapons developments.

"Dulles rebuffed the renewed AEC attacks prior to his illness. It is widely believed in Washington that with the Secretary out of action there is no powerful figure in the administration to advise the President to keep on negotiating at Geneva. Some officials are worried that a collapse of the talks will enable the Russians to claim, and with considerable success around the world, that the United States was responsible for the failure.

"Gore's proposal

"Senator ALBERT GORE, Democrat, of Tennessee, told Mr. Eisenhower last November that U.S. prestige and responsibility were involved and there was no way that the United States can be disassociated from either the success or failure of the conference. GORE suggested that instead of trying to negotiate a control system, the President announce the unconditional and unilateral cessation of all nuclear tests in the earth's atmosphere for a specified period, say 3 years, and ask other powers to do so. This would permit underground, underwater and outerspace testing.

"Dulles said at that time that the Gore proposal might be taken up if the Geneva negotiations failed. The Gore proposal was criticized, however, on the ground that it would lack the political effect of an inspection agreement which would help break down the Iron Curtain."

Mr. President, when our representatives gathered at Geneva, with those of the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union, they had before them the blueprint for what could readily be made a technically sufficient system for the detection of nuclear explosions.

With this formula on the table before them, their task was to fill in the technical framework with a reliable management to operate the system, so that each party could be adequately safeguarded against covert violations of the suspension agreement.

Any trustworthy system for the detection and control of nuclear tests must meet certain elementary standards. It must be operated by an international commission, that is, by an authority apart from the direction of any one participant. The commission must have the power to man and operate the requisite control stations with qualified personnel who are not subservient to the country within which they may be located, but are accountable only to the commission for which they work. And the inspection teams must have the latitude needed to accomplish their purpose—to monitor the atmosphere and report upon any evidence of nuclear activity, and to move promptly, when directed by the commission to do so, to the site of any seismic disturbance, reasonably suspected of being nuclear in origin.

These are the minimum prerequisites of any trustworthy system for the detection and control of nuclear tests. Without accepting these minimums, there is no control system, not even a shadow of one.

It is because the Soviet Union has thus far indicated an inflexible unwillingness to accept these minimums that the Geneva conference is now threatened with imminent collapse. The Russian delegation has adamantly persisted in the following three positions:

First. They demand a veto power over the operations of the proposed international control commission.

Second. They insist that the requisite control posts be self-operated, that is, dominated by nationals of the countries within which the posts are located.

Third. They call for complicated procedures that would easily frustrate prompt action by the commission in dispatching inspection teams to make necessary on-the-spot investigations of subterranean disturbances suspected of being nuclear in nature, or of preventing these essential at-site investigations from occurring at all.

Obviously, Mr. President, these conditions are as unacceptable as the proffered arguments in defense of them are untenable. One of our negotiators at Geneva, Assistant Secretary of State Philip J. Farley, succinctly outlined the reasonableness of the American position at Geneva, when he testified before the Disarmament Subcommittee of the Senate on January 28, as follows:

"The United States believes that any control system which could be frustrated in its day-to-day operations by the veto power in the hands of a single party would be worse than useless.

"The Soviet position (to man control posts by nationals of the government on whose territory the control posts are located) would amount to self-inspection and as such cannot be the basis for an agreement in which all parties can have confidence.

"Will international inspection groups be organized and ready to move quickly to the site of an event which could be suspected of being an explosion? Or will sending of such a group be subject to weeks of debate and a veto? The Soviet approach would entangle this key provision in miles of red-tape."

As to these issues, Mr. President, there can be no compromise. Suspension of all further nuclear tests, in the air, underground, underwater, and in space, must rest upon a workable system of detection and control in which responsible men, mindful of the mortal stakes, can repose confidence. Unless the Russians recede, the original purpose of the Geneva conference, that of ending all types of further nuclear weapons tests, is not now attainable.

PART IV. GENEVA, A PROPOSAL FOR THE 11TH HOUR

As it has become apparent that the Russians are likely to hold fast to their three tenets at Geneva, it has seemed to many that the conference is doomed. Predictions are that it will break up soon, accomplishing nothing. If this happens, our last best hope for progress in this critical field may well be foreclosed. We are now in the 11th hour at Geneva, a fateful moment for the human race.

Mr. President, even though I share the pessimism that the conference won't achieve its original objective, I do not believe it necessarily follows that the conference must therefore break up, accomplishing nothing. If we cannot achieve all of our goal, it may still be possible to obtain part of it.

If Geneva is to fail in its objective of creating a broad international control system that could adequately police the suspension of all further nuclear weapons tests, the responsibility for that failure will be clearly Russian. But if such an eventuality cannot be avoided, I would earnestly hope that my country would make one final effort to salvage something of value, for humanity's sake, from the long labors that have brought us to this conference table.

As a last resort, to attempt the avoidance of a total failure, I strongly urge that the United States make this final proposal: An agreement to suspend further nuclear weapons tests in the earth's atmosphere, within the framework of a trustworthy and sufficient international control system, adequate to reliably detect and report any violation. Such a proposal would exclude, for the present, any agreement involving suspension or control of nuclear tests occurring underground, underwater, or in outer space, none of which contribute to the pollution of the air, the grave cause of so much world concern.

Mr. President, last week I discussed this proposal with Mr. William B. Macomber, Jr., Assistant Secretary of State for Congressional Relations, and Mr. Ronald Spiers, Officer in Charge of Disarmament Affairs, who is involved with the Geneva negotiations. At their suggestion, I submitted the proposal, in letter form, to our Acting Secretary of State, Christian Herter, and they were, at that time, informed of my intention to call the proposal to the attention of the Senate from the floor today. I ask unanimous consent that the letter, dated February 25, 1959, be included in the RECORD immediately following the conclusion of my address.

Mr. President, I anticipate that certain objections will at once be raised to my proposal. However, within the context in which I have offered it, I believe them to be answerable.

For example, the scientific fact may be that American, English, and Russian technicians, functioning at home, now are able to detect the fact of nuclear explosion anywhere in the atmosphere, and determine much concerning it. Nevertheless, we must remember that the commencement of an international control system is the sine qua non of man's progress toward any feasible disarmament. Broadened nuclear testing controls, which we might seek in the future, and eventual inspection for prevention of surprise attack, are but milestones on the road to this goal. It is altogether probable that advancement here will come, if at all, only a step at a time. My proposal would be a first step, and the Geneva conference may yet constitute the best opportunity left to take it. An international control system which functions, however limited its initial scope might be, is the urgent need.

Another objection to be anticipated is that this proposal is a futile one, in that the Russian behavior at Geneva makes it apparent that the Soviet Union does not really intend to agree to anything acceptable to the United States and Great Britain. It may be urged that the same considerations, which have prevented agreement within the framework of existing negotiations, would apply equally to my proposal. This may prove to be the case. Indeed, the evidence point very strongly in that direction. But we cannot know that the Russians will reject the proposal, unless and until it is offered and refused.

Throughout the negotiations to date, it is worthwhile to remember that Soviet spokesmen, from Khrushchev down, have repeatedly expressed their fears and suspicions concerning the movement of foreign inspection personnel within Russia. Their characterization of our position, as amounting to a thinly disguised attempt to gain military reconnaissance of their country, is based upon their propaganda specter of teams of technicians scurrying into every corner of their country in the guise of checking seismic disturbances, earthquakes, to see if they are nuclear in origin. This is why they say they want the veto; this is why they say they want the control stations manned with their own people; this is why they say they want our agreement to miles of red tape before inspection teams can move at all.

Under the control system I propose, the necessity for this movement should be largely, if not entirely, eliminated. Fewer control stations would be required, and fewer foreign nationals would need to be stationed in the countries involved.

If the Russians are negotiating in good faith, the lesser control system required to police a suspension of nuclear tests in the atmosphere only, would constitute a refutation of most of the objections they have voiced, since the conference began. It might even serve to allay the unreasoning fears that seem to lurk in the Soviet mind. The Russians were suspicious people long before the Communists achieved ascendency. The czars maintained their own Iron Curtain.

If the Russians are not negotiating in good faith at Geneva, as I strongly suspect may be the case, then what better way to expose their game than by offering them an international inspection and control system that can safely end the slow pollution of the atmosphere, without possibly doing them any internal mischief. By forcing the Russian hand, refusal to accept such a proposal would reveal their hypocrisy before the world.

But it may be urged, Mr. President, that the Russians might seize upon such a proposal as evidence to bolster the charge that the United States did not really support ending of all nuclear tests, but always has wanted tests to continue, thus somehow absolving Russia from blame for the failure to reach agreement. I would give little credence to this argument. As I have already indicated, it seems to me that the proposal I suggest would weaken, not strengthen, the Communist propaganda. In any case, we know that the Russians will contrive to blame the United States for a breakup of the conference. Whatever occurs, their indictment of us will be artfully drawn and made to sound plausible. In some quarters, the Communist story will be believed, regardless of what the truth may be, or what we may say about it. But this prospect should not be permitted to govern our decisions. As to these, we are, in the last analysis, accountable only to the trust we hold.

Mr. President, I have made this proposal, not in the spirit of criticism of the course we have heretofore taken in Geneva, but in support of it. It is meant to be a constructive proposal that cannot possibly jeopardize our present negotiations, but might possibly salvage something of value before they collapse, and we are forced to leave the conference table.

If there are cogent reasons rendering my proposal inadvisable, then I shall want to know what they are. The people, too, are entitled to know what they are. For we may still possess a momentous opportunity at Geneva, fast slipping from our grasp. It may not come again in our time.

Good conscience commands that we do our utmost there.

This is an anxious hour.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, the statement by Ambassador Wadsworth at Geneva, as reported in the press, reflects the fact that the State Department did indeed give my proposal most careful consideration. He recites that our effort at Geneva to make a meaningful start in arms control must not fail; that at Geneva we have an unparalleled opportunity to take an important step toward reduction of international tensions, and that success would open the way for further agreement on substantial disarmament measures.

On March 2, I said on the Senate floor, that—

> It seemed to me that, in what may now be the death agonies of the conference at Geneva, there was an urgent opportunity, which was quite possibly slipping away from us, to achieve a breakthrough at the conference table which would establish an essential first step toward international controls, which must in the future constitute the basis of any progress we can possibly make toward the great goals of prevention of surprise attack and general disarmament.

Ambassador Wadsworth referred to the same three objections I had outlined in my letter to Secretary Herter, and he said that an agreement for controlled cessation of tests within the atmosphere would allow us to postpone, for the time being, some of the obstacles to agreement and still achieve early concrete results.

Mr. President, the truly important thing is that at Geneva and around the world, the impression was growing that the United States in fact did not want an agreement. Men in high station in this country in the Pentagon and the AEC have more and more openly applauded the developments which seemed to doom the conference to failure. Given our country's increasing dependence on nuclear weapons, both for deterrence and defense, they have argued that more tests are needed to refine our atmospheric warheads and to chart new discoveries in antimissilery. The action by the Department of State last Monday affirmed, at a critical time, that the United States does share the worldwide concern about the poisoning of the air; that we have not taken a frozen position at Geneva which would discourage any advance; and that we realize in order to negotiate we must be patient and diligent, seeking agreement in those fields where agreement is feasible, content to make progress in little steps.

It may well be that the Soviets will not accept a properly policed ban on atomospheric tests, but we have now put the proposal to them, and there is at least ground for hope. The fact that atmospheric explosions can be monitored, largely from fixed control stations, eliminating the need for on-site investigations, should alleviate any genuine fears which the Russians may have about roving foreign reconnaissance within their country. On the other hand, if their fears are simulated, what better way could we find to expose them than by offering, as we have, an international detection and control system that can safely end the slow pollution of the atmosphere without possibly doing them any internal mischief?

Mr. President, the day following the State Department's action, the Christian Science Monitor editorially commended this step-by-step plan, and I ask unanimous consent that its editorial be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MORE DRIVE FOR A TEST BAN

A new door to negotiations for an atomic test ban has just been opened. On the resumption of the three-power meeting at Geneva the United States, supported by Britain, has put forward a step-by-step plan, starting with tests in the earth's atmosphere. The first response of the Soviet delegation was negative. But the proposal can clarify issues and focus world opinion on obstructive tactics.

The Soviet Union is not the only nation guilty of obstruction. Only a few weeks after this conference began in October, Washington released a report by experts upsetting all calculations for distinguishing underground explosions from earthquakes. At the same time information was available in Washington indicating that modification of detecting devices could offset this difficulty. This information was withheld.

Even so, Moscow has erected most of the barricades against agreement. In two respects particularly its position appears unreasonable: (1) It insists that inspection teams be controlled by nationals of the nation where they are stationed. This amounts to self-inspection. (2) It demands a veto in the international control agency. This means it could block action—as it often has in the United Nations Security Council.

Yet there are persistent reports that the Kremlin really desires a test ban. The main reason is said to be its concern lest many smaller nations obtain bombs. This would greatly multiply the danger of an accident triggering a nuclear war. It is said Moscow would like to head off such a situation, but may stall, using test-ban negotiations for propaganda or as bargaining points at the summit meeting.

But the British and American delegations appear to be freeing the Soviet hand. While preferring an all-out ban, they are willing to put aside sticky questions about detecting underground or outer-space explosions. By confining inspection problems to nuclear detonations in the atmosphere—where detection is easier—such a move could make it harder to raise technical obstacles.

The greatest popular concern about atomic tests arises from their pollution of the atmosphere with radioactive material. Such tests not only produce the main danger from fallout; they are also far more easy to detect than are explosions underground or in outer space. This has led to hope that by limiting a ban to atmospheric tests agreement could be facilitated.

Last November Senator GORE proposed that the United States offer to give up tests in the atmosphere for a specified period—say 3 years—and invite Russia and Britain to work out an agreement. Six weeks ago Senator CHURCH urged a similar plan as an "eleventh-hour" effort to save the Geneva conference, but he proposed to start with an agreement rather than a unilateral ban. This is the plan now offered by the West.

There is some hope that technical improvements in detection—especially by the use of satellites—will ease the stalemate over inspection. But many Americans will be glad to see their Government pressing for at least an end to testing that pollutes the atmosphere—the good air which belongs to all earth's peoples.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, this editorial concludes by saying that many Americans will be glad to see their Government pressing for at least an end to testing which pollutes the atmosphere—the good air which belongs to all earth's peoples.

If the Russians rebuff this proposal and force us to take the grim road back from Geneva, we can now walk that road without shame, knowing that we have done our utmost to avoid it.

NOMINATION OF CLARE BOOTHE LUCE TO BE AMBASSADOR TO BRAZIL

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, one of the fundamentals of the functioning of the democratic process is that everyone has the right to have opinions about public issues and public servants, and, above all, the right to express such opinions.

Yet the recent attacks on Mrs. Clare Boothe Luce's nomination to be Ambassador to Brazil suggest that there are those among us who would make an exception with regard to the right of opinion and free speech, that exception being anyone who might conceivably be nominated some day to be an Ambassador.

The logical conclusion of this line of thought is that the ideal American representative probably is a political and intellectual cipher.

The attack upon Mrs. Luce is based largely upon the fact that some 15 years ago she made a strongly partisan political speech. She herself has described that speech as intemperate.

Who in this body has the right to cast the first stone in that respect? Does the current uproar mean that anyone with the gumption to take a position, to have opinions strongly held and strongly expressed, is to be forever barred from the service of his or her country in a diplomatic role?

This whole assault is preposterous. No such attack was made when Mrs. Luce's nomination to be Ambassador to Italy was confirmed. At that time her political speech making was of much more recent memory. What is the reason for the attack now, based upon the speeches going back a decade and a half? The timing seems especially peculiar, in view of Mrs. Luce's excellent performance as our Ambassador to Italy. It was fortunate indeed that the United States was represented by this talented Ambassador at such a critical juncture in Italy's history, so fraught with peril not only to that great country, but to the entire world.

I only hope that, in fairness, and in the best interests of our country, this spurious issue will be quickly resolved, to the end that Mrs. Luce can get on with her job in Brazil, and we can get on with our job in the Senate.

GOVERNMENT SPENDING AND INFLATION

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, it is my firm belief that those in America who wish to resist inflation and a further increase in our national debt, and to resist continued high spending, are in the majority. They are aware of the terrible consequences which come to a nation whose currency, little by little, but continuously, becomes worth less and less.

Often, however, the conservative people, even though, in my opinion, they are in the majority, do not speak up. One such citizen has done so. I refer to an eminent doctor, Dr. L. D. Moell, of Beatrice, Nebr., who has written me a letter upon the subject. I ask unanimous consent to have the letter printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BEATRICE, NEBR., April 9, 1959.

Senator CARL T. CURTIS,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR CURTIS: Certainly by merely glancing at my letterhead you have guessed that this is another plea for your efforts in favor of the Keogh bill (H.R. 10). Those who expect to benefit from this bill are not merely a minority seeking an advantage, but rather it is a move by them to become equal citizens with the many who now have tax deferment plans available and we asked to do it on our own, not have Government do it for us.

As a member of the medical profession, I wish to express my disfavor with the Forand bill. There are many provisions at the present time for the care of indigent patients, not the least of which is that time devoted by the physician free of charge to those who need it. The result of the Forand bill would be terrific expense to the Government and cause chaotic congestion in our hospitals. What beneficiary of such a plan could resist the temptation to demand hospitalization for any and all illnesses, since if he were not hospitalized he would stand the cost himself.

I am most deeply concerned however, about a widespread infectious illness which has afflicted our people since 1932. If it were a physical illness the Government would move with haste to stamp it out like the plague. Instead it seems that it is in many ways cultured. The sufferer is easily recognized for his palm is outstretched toward Washington and he is blind to the fact that Uncle Sam has a hand in his hip pocket. The disease "Gimme-itis" can be cured only by a horse-capsule-sized dose of discipline, taken by voters and legislators alike so that they will come to their senses realizing that the U.S. Mint is not a "something for nothing machine," and that bankruptcy is the only end result to continued deficit spending at home, in business, or in government. At autopsy, the true pathology revealed would be a tremendously enlarged organ, "big Government," which, tumorlike, destroys the host. I hope the United States of America does not come to autopsy.

Sincerely,

L. D. MOELL, M. D.

VERRAZANO DAY

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, April 17, 1959, has been proclaimed by Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller as Verrazano Day in the State of New York. On this day, the citizens of the Empire State will honor the memory and remarkable achievements of Giovanni da Verrazano, the Italian discoverer and navigator, whose contributions to the early exploration of America were truly monumental.

The illustrious and daring Verrazano was born about 1485 near Florence, Italy. Thus he lived during the rise of European civilization in that fresh and reborn age of vital energy we call the Renaissance. In the 15th Century, the Italians were perhaps the most advanced of all European peoples. With pride in their nation as being descended from the populus Romanus, Italians found the food necessary to nourish the new creative spirit.

In today's world, as we face new horizons and are confronted with Gargantuan challenges, the extraordinary exploits of this Renaissance Italian appeal strongly to the minds of Americans.

The greatness of Verrazano has been largely overlooked by many people. In this connection, I want to pay special tribute to the Italian Historical Society of America and other groups which have done so much to accord proper recognition to this illustrious Florentine.

It is true little is known of Verrazano's early life. He entered the French maritime service while still in his twenties and served as a corsair in expeditions against Spanish shipping. About the beginning of the 16th Century, he made some trade voyages to the Orient.

In 1522 he captured two ships which Cortes had dispatched, loaded with spoils, from Mexico to Spain. Francis I, the King of France, was so impressed by this valorous accomplishment and the captive treasure from the New World that he placed Verrazano in command of an expedition to America. Ostensibly, Verrazano's mission was to seek a northwest passage to the Orient, but actually, his purpose was to extend the French Empire to the New World.

In 1524 this brave Italian set sail, eventually landing on or near the shore of what is now North Carolina. He then sailed northward along the Atlantic Coast. On this cruise he discovered, on April 17, New York Harbor and Manhattan Island, before sailing to Narragansett Bay and the coasts of Massachusetts and Maine. He then sailed farther north and reached Nova Scotia and Newfoundland. Verrazano's account of his discoveries to the King of France is the first recorded description of the northeast coast of America.

Together with Columbus and Americus Vespucius, Verrazano was thus one of the earliest Italian contributors to American civilization. As everyone knows, there have been many millions more. People of Italian descent have played a continuous and prominent role in the development of our country.

In the 16th and 17th centuries, Italians explored and spread the Gospel in the New World. In Colonial times, Italians were sought as settlers because of their special skills in manufacturing, artisanship, and agriculture. During the independence movement, Phillip Mazzei, a native of Florence, writing under the pen name of "Furioso," contributed a series of widely circulated articles to the Virginia Gazette denouncing the misrule and suppression of liberty by Great Britain.

An Italian painter, Constantino Brumidi, devoted nearly 30 years to creating the historical murals in the rotunda of our Nation's Capitol. An infinite parade of Italian conductors, instrumentalists, and vocalists has enriched the musical culture of the United States. From the very beginnings of our Nation, these Italians were welcomed with open arms so that America might assimilate their culture and emulate their achievements.

Italians settling in this country have shown wellsprings of talent and adaptability. In the free air of the United States, their abilities have been unleashed with an explosive dynamism. Never before has so large a group stepped so quickly into the mainstream of American life. In the span of a single generation, millions of Americans with Italian backgrounds, have come to occupy a position of full equality—and often of eminent distinction—in every field of endeavor.

Mr. President, America is deeply grateful for the contributions which Italians have made to its way of life. Their undeviating devotion to God and country, their boundless energy, their undying vitality, their outstanding artistic attainments, their irrepressible gaiety, and their other very special and unique talents have made the United States a better and happier place for all of us.

Because the intrepid Verrazano was in a very real sense the forerunner of the millions of his countrymen who later followed his route to our shores, it is fitting that we celebrate the anniversary of the day when he first landed here. It would be well for all Americans to study the life of this man and ponder his example of courage and resourcefulness and perseverance, for never was this Nation in greater need of these qualities than today.

COSTLIER FINANCING

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the lead story in the Wall Street Journal this morning is extremely significant. It is especially significant to Members of Congress. It points out that interest rates are increasing, and it discusses the impact of the increase in interest rates.

I should like to read very briefly two or three excerpts from that lead article:

Business borrowing costs, already up from the levels of a few months ago, are headed higher still.

"With continued recovery, we're sure to face a growing demand for loans," says a top official of one New York City bank, "and it isn't going to take much growth to bring a general increase in interest rates."

I should like to read what the Wall Street Journal says about the consequences of this increase in interest rates:

The higher rate trend is of broad significance. It's pushing up costs for businessmen and conceivably could deter some plant expansion or inventory rebuilding projects and thus slow recovery. It adds to the already heavy debt-financing problems of the U.S. Treasury, which must refund $27 billion in maturing debt by December, starting with a $4.5 billion job late this month. It means higher mortgage borrowing costs for home buyers. And it could lead to higher borrowing costs for individuals who buy autos, appliances, and other goods on time.

The Wall Street Journal does not point out something which I think is apparent to those who have considered interest rates and their impact on the economy, particularly the devastating effect they have on municipalities and school districts. Meeting the urgent need for building schools, hospitals, streets, and so forth, depends upon borrowing. If interest rates go up, as they have gone up, municipalities are prevented from doing what they should do to serve their citizens and to provide the jobs which are so essential to our economy.

Mr. President, the reason I rise to speak on the issue is that it is not something which has merely happened; it is the result of very careful, thoughtful, and premeditated planning on the part of the Federal Reserve Board. The Board is convinced that higher interest rates will help stem inflation. Mr. President, there is not one iota of evidence that cost of living will go down under present circumstances, if interest rates go up. The Federal Reserve Board, of course, is a creature of Congress, and therefore we have some responsibility for what it does. We have responsibility for the cost consequences that result.

The Wall Street Journal, in another article today reports:

Business recovery, rising interest rates on short-term Treasury bills hint at a new boost in the Federal Reserve's discount rate. The Reserve Board seems sure to move after the next Treasury financings; it may act even sooner.

Mr. President, interest rates, which have been going up rapidly—and only recently we suffered a substantial increase—apparently will go up again if the Federal Reserve Board decides they should go up.

The Wall Street Journal goes on to say:

As for the banks' supply of loanable funds, it is being kept in close check by the Reserve System. The System has accomplished its aim largely by selling Treasury securities; a purchaser of such securities naturally draws funds from a bank to pay for them.

This of course is the Federal Reserve Board's open operation tool which is being used by the Reserve System to tighten credit and make it harder to borrow money and to compel banks to increase their interest rates.

It seems to me that this is a policy on the part of our Federal Reserve Board which is bound to have the effect of retarding and slowing recovery, as the Wall Street Journal points out. In doing this it will prevent employment of some of the 4,300,000 men and women who are out of work.

I ask unanimous consent that the two articles published by the Wall Street Journal, from which I have read extracts, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMPANIES' BANK, BOND BORROWING COSTS RISE; NEW INCREASES LIKELY—TREASURY, MORTGAGE DEMAND HEAVY; FEDERAL RESERVE LIMITS BANKS' FUNDS—BOND MEN TAKE A BEATING

(By Lee Silberman and Patrick Carberry)

NEW YORK.—Business borrowing costs, already up from the levels of a few months ago, are headed higher still.

That's the forecast of bankers and bond dealers here in the Nation's key financial center. New York City banks, including such giants as First National City Bank and Chase Manhattan Bank, account for some 25 percent of all bank loans to business—and their policies influence banks the Nation over. And it's here that the bulk of all corporate bond borrowing is centered.

"With continued recovery, we're sure to face a growing demand for loans," says a top official of one New York City bank. "And it isn't going to take much growth to bring a general increase in interest rates."

"A corporation that wants to sell any sizable quantity of bonds simply is going to have to offer higher interest rates," says one New York bond underwriter. "There aren't any real amounts of money available at present rates."

SIGNIFICANCE OF THE TREND

The higher rate trend is of broad significance. It's pushing up costs for businessmen and conceivably could deter some plant expansion or inventory rebuilding projects and thus slow recovery. It adds to the already heavy debt financing problems of the U.S. Treasury, which must refund $27 billion in maturing debt by December, starting with a $4.5 billion job late this month. It means higher mortgage borrowing costs for home buyers. And it could lead to higher borrowing costs for individuals who buy autos, appliances, and other goods on time.

A general increase in interest rates on bank loans to business would be touched off by an increase in the prime rate—the rate banks charge the biggest borrowers with the best credit ratings. Rates for all other firms are scaled upward from the prime rate. The most recent change in this key rate came last September, when it was boosted to the present 4-percent level from 3½ percent. (The chart below traces the prime rate since World War II.)

Somewhat ironically, the prospect of still-higher rates looms at a time when business demand for credit is anything but overwhelming. The Federal Reserve Bank of New York, for example, reported yesterday that business loans of major New York City banks so far this year have declined by 2.4 percent to a total of $10.7 billion. And a New York bond dealer comments that corporate bond offerings in the recent past "certainly haven't been particularly heavy."

BEHIND THE PRESSURE

With business demands so far so modest, what's putting upward pressure on interest rates? New York bankers and bond dealers offer a number of explanations:

Demand from homebuyers and the U.S. Treasury is strong and growing; they're competing for the same funds.

Life insurance companies and savings banks, usually heavy purchasers of corporate bonds, are putting more of their money into higher yielding home mortgages.

The Federal Reserve System, worried about the threat of new inflation, is keeping a tight rein on the funds banks have available to lend.

Savings banks and some other savings institutions are gaining new deposits at a slower rate than a year ago. With recovery, individuals appear to be channeling more of their funds into spending and less into savings.

The booming stock market is drawing more funds from individuals which otherwise would have gone into savings institutions or into bonds.

BOND BORROWING COST

There's evidence aplenty of the higher bond borrowing costs—they're already the highest since 1957. Central Power & Light Co., of Corpus Christi, Tex., for example, on Tuesday sold $11 million of 30-year first mortgage bonds at an annual interest cost of 4.645 percent. That compares with the 4.515 percent another electric utility, Ohio Power Co., is paying for the $25 million it raised March 30 through the sale of similarly rated 30-year bonds.

Montana Power Co. on March 24 sold $15 million of bonds to underwriters who resold them to investors at a price to yield 4.43 percent. On the following day, Ohio Edison Co. sold $30 million of bonds, which were reoffered to investors at a price that also yielded 4.43 percent. Recently, however, both issues have been selling on the market at prices to bring purchasers about 4.60 percent.

As for bank loans, the New York Federal Reserve Bank yesterday announced that business loans made by major New York City banks during the first half of March carried an average interest rate of 4.49 percent if the loans were to run a year or longer, compared with 4.39 percent in the comparable period of December and with 4.29 percent in the like 2 weeks of March 1958. On loans for less than a year, the rise was less sharp; last month's figure was 4.22 percent against 4.21 percent in December and 4.20 percent in March 1958.

New York City bankers evidence no alarm over the decline in their business loans since January 1. The chief reason: The first few months of each year normally see a decline in loans. Business concerns usually borrow heavily in the fall for such purposes as financing the movement of crops to market and building up inventories for the Christmas selling season. Early in the following year, they begin repaying these loans.

Then, too, the decline so far this year has been relatively smaller than the decrease in the like 1958 period; this year's 2.4-percent decline compares with a drop of 4 percent in the corresponding period a year ago.

A major factor that's held down bank loans up to now: Corporations during the recession tended to accumulate cash. Uncertain as to the future, they postponed spending on expansion and even maintenance projects. "As a result," says one New York banker, "many corporations have been in such a liquid position that they haven't had to borrow."

Bankers, however, are convinced this situation is about to change. Steel-using industries already are borrowing heavily to build up inventories in anticipation of a possible midyear steel strike. Users of rubber products and aluminum, commodities also threatened by strikes, also are borrowing more heavily.

USING UP INVENTORIES

Such borrowing, of course, will taper off if the strikes materialize—or even if they don't. One way or another, steel, rubber, and aluminum users will be using up their inventories for a time. By the time such borrowing begins to decline, however, bankers believe other loans will be more than taking up the slack.

For one thing, bankers look for a general buildup of inventories, entirely aside from the strike-inspired buying that's now going on. "Companies generally pared their inventories to the bone during the recession," comments one New York banker. "With sales picking up, it's only natural that they would start rebuilding stocks."

Then, too, bankers—as well as bond dealers—look for a growing demand for funds to finance plant expansion. Companies last year cut such outlays to $30.5 billion, down sharply from 1957's total of $37 billion. The Commerce Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission on the basis of surveys report businessmen now intend to spend $31.8 billion on expansion during 1959. If business continues to move upward, of course, it's possible this figure could turn out to be even higher.

A strong upsurge in business demand for funds naturally would add to the pressures already tending to push interest rates upward.

One of the heaviest of these current pressures is the demand for mortgage money. The seasonally-adjusted annual rate of private housing starts last month rose to 1,390,000. That compared with 1,320,000 in February, and was the highest rate for any March since 1950. New homes mean new mortgage loans; the amount of new Government-underwritten home mortgage loans made in January, the latest month for which figures are available, was $700 million, compared with $418 million in January 1958.

"Life insurance companies and savings banks are largely out of the bond market," comments a New York City bond dealer, "because they can get higher yields on other investments, such as mortgages." Mortgage interest rates vary widely—from around 5 percent to well over 6 percent—depending on the type of property and its location. But such rates generally are higher than investors now can get on top-rated corporate bonds.

As for the banks' supply of loanable funds, it is being kept in close check by the Reserve System. The System has accomplished its aim largely by selling Treasury securities; a purchaser of such securities naturally draws funds from a bank to pay for them.

THE BANKS' RESERVES

The effectiveness of the Federal Reserve's measures shows up clearly in the banks' reserve position. They're required to keep on deposit with the System amounts equal to a specified percentage of the deposits on their own books. Through most of the first half of 1958, the System was keeping the banks well supplied with funds in an effort to see to it that the recession was not deepened by tight money. So the banks' reserves on an average day ran about $500 million more than requirements. Recently, by contrast, the banks have had to borrow a total of about $150 million on an average day to bring their reserves up to the required level.

Also tending to limit the supply of funds available to businessmen is a slower rate of gain in savings noted by some savings institutions. Deposits of the Nation's mutual savings banks, for example, rose by $233 million in the first 2 months of 1959 to a total of $33.9 billion. That compared with a $382 million rise in the like 1958 period.

One reason that banks won't hesitate to boost the prime rate when they decide such a move is justified by demand can be gleaned from their earnings statements. With the decline in loans of the past year or so, aggregate New York City bank net operating earnings in each of the past three quarters have slipped below those of the like periods a year earlier.

NEEDED: STABILITY

The bond dealers also have had earnings problems of late, but to correct these the dealers need interest rate stability more than higher rates.

Underwriters, after trying for several days to market bond issues of three utilities, last Tuesday still had substantial amounts of the three issues on their hands. So they abandoned efforts to sell the issues at the original offering prices and let them find their own lower levels on the market. At lower price levels, the effective interest rate is higher. The issues involved were those of Montana Power and Ohio Edison, plus a $7 million offering of Gulf Power Co. bonds. Market specialists estimate the out-of-pocket loss to the underwriters at $125,000, exclusive of expenses and commissions to salesmen.

Despite the interest rate uncertainty, most underwriters are continuing to bid on new bond issues. But failure to win such issues at the moment may be a bit less disappointing now than it would have been a few months ago. Quips one bond man, in rhyme:

"The prayer to which my heart responds
Is let my bid not win the bonds."

WASHINGTON WIRE—A SPECIAL WEEKLY REPORT FROM THE WALL STREET JOURNAL'S CAPITAL BUREAU

Debt managers head into new troubles. Their breathing spell is over.

The Treasury faces heavy borrowing needs just as interest rates generally are rising (see column 6). The Government must refund $27 billion in maturing debt by December, starting with a $4.5 billion job late this month. Unpredictable cash needs may add to the load. Interest yields nose higher now, especially on longer-term Treasury bonds. Officials fear a new uptrend.

Debt managers shy from any plan to put out a new long-term bond now. A long-term issue would crowd the 4¼ percent interest rate ceiling on bonds of 5 years or more. The Treasury's competition from business for long-term money grows. New credit-curbing moves by the Federal Reserve promise to complicate the debt management job.

Business recovery, rising interest rates on short-term Treasury bills hint at a new boost in the Federal Reserve's discount rate. The Reserve Board seems sure to move after the next Treasury financings; it may act even sooner.

THE BERLIN CRISIS AND THE PATH TO PEACE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, recently I read in the newspapers an account of the speech which was delivered by the distinguished senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] at the Westchester County Democratic Committee dinner in New Rochelle, N.Y., on Saturday, April 11. It was a brilliant speech, and I ask unanimous consent that the entire speech may be printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

First, however, I believe it is desirable to reinforce the RECORD by reading the last few lines of the speech, because it is the kind of unusual plea of which the American people should hear more.

Said Senator HUMPHREY:

I think I understand well the Communist threat. I have talked to Khrushchev. I have seen at first hand his vigor, his determination, his ruthlessness. I know the power of totalitarian might. We must never underestimate this massive threat.

More to be feared than Soviet hardness is our own softness.

More to be feared than ruthless Soviet purpose is our aimlessness.

More to be feared than the pernicious appeal of Communist slogans to the disinherited of this earth is our own inability to develop a clear sense of purpose and to give mankind a vision of noble destiny.

I do not believe the pessimists who say that as a people we Americans cannot or will not meet the demands of the present trial of Western civilization.

I do not propose that we chastise the American people.

I propose that we challenge them.

The measure of our responsibility is such that we must act with greatness. No people have ever risen to greatness without being called to greatness.

The tragedy of these years is that the voice that should summon us is silent.

There being no objection, the text of the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE BERLIN CRISIS AND THE PATH TO PEACE

(Remarks prepared for delivery by Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, of Minnesota, at Westchester County Democratic Committee dinner, Glen Island Casino, New Rochelle, N.Y., Saturday, April 11, 1959)

We now look back on 10 years of cooperation within the NATO alliance, and we look forward to the rapidly advancing climax of the Berlin crisis.

These two—NATO and Berlin—are closely linked together.

The first Berlin crisis of 1948–49 brought the NATO community into being.

The present Berlin crisis tests whether that unique community of nations, conceived in common danger and dedicated to common security, can long endure.

FIRMNESS BEFORE THE SOVIET THREAT

We have learned from hard experience to be firm before the Soviet threat.

We learned much in Greece and Turkey in 1947. And what we learned we put into action when Congress endorsed President Truman's now famous doctrine.

"It must be the policy of the United States," said President Truman 12 years ago, "to support free peoples who are resisting attempted subjugation."

We learned the hard way in Czechoslovakia in 1948 when the Communists overthrew a free government. Then came the blockade of West Berlin. We were threatened. But by now we had learned well that those who do not stand firm will not remain free. We did not withdraw from the beleagured city. For 9 months free Berlin was sustained by an allied air bridge built of ingenuity and daring.

The lessons learned in Czechoslovakia and Berlin made their impact. Joining hands with the free nations of Europe, we created an unprecedented international community. NATO was established in 1949, just 10 years ago. Twelve nations, augmented by three more which joined later, pledged that "an armed attack against one shall be considered an attack against them all."

The community of nations comprising NATO is the core of the Western World. If this community stands firm and united in the cause of freedom and justice, we shall prevail. If it collapses, we shall be in mortal danger.

The Soviets once more are threatening freedom in Berlin. They are probing to see whether that unique and indispensable community which is NATO can indeed endure.

Last November I stood in West Berlin with its able and courageous mayor, Willy Brandt. I vowed then, and I vow today, to support a policy of firmness, to uphold the right of France, Britain, and the United States to maintain garrisons in West Berlin until a legitimate peace treaty is signed.

This is the position and policy of our Government. It is also the position and policy of NATO. We will not surrender. We will not be pushed out.

But firmness before the Soviet threat, though indispensable, is not enough. Firmness alone will not preserve NATO, nor assure the survival of free Berlin.

Our firmness must be matched by our imagination and our willingness to negotiate.

Standing firm and a willingness to negotiate are not, as some suggest, contradictory policies. They are the two elements in any viable policy in the Berlin crisis. We can negotiate successfully only if we are prepared to stand firm. And we can command the political support necessary to a posture of firmness only if our negotiating position is clear, consistent, and realistic.

We may be grateful that this also is the position and the policy of our Government and of NATO. We will stand firm. And we will negotiate.

THE REQUIREMENTS OF NEGOTIATION

It is about negotiation that I want to talk with you for a few minutes tonight. I have frequently said that we must be willing to talk to the Russians wherever and whenever there seems even the faintest hope of advancing the interests of peace and security.

Remember that we negotiated with the Russians on Austria for 10 years. Finally we got a treaty.

Remember that we negotiated with the Communists on Korea for 2 years. In the end we got a cease-fire.

For months we have been negotiating in Geneva on the cessation of nuclear tests. So far, there is no agreement. But we must go on negotiating.

This is what I had in mind when, on March 26, I introduced on the floor of the Senate a resolution which reads in part as follows:

"Resolved, That the Senate support the efforts of the United States to continue to negotiate for an international agreement for the suspension of nuclear weapons tests and that it emphatically endorse the principle that an adequate inspection and control system must be a part of any such international agreement."

There is no alternative. We must negotiate on Berlin, on Germany, and on the general question of European security. We must go to the summit, and more than once if that is necessary.

I do not propose to talk tonight about the specific elements of our negotiating position in the forthcoming meetings of the Foreign Ministers of East and West. It would be both presumptuous and indelicate for a member of the legislative branch to speak of such affairs at the very moment that that position is being hammered out by the statesmen of the Western Powers.

But if I do not talk about the specifics, it is appropriate—in fact it is an obligation on all of us—to speak about the broad requirements of a viable negotiating position.

There has been much loose talk about Munich—about the dangers of being taken in by the Russians at the negotiating table.

I do not need to tell this audience that Berlin is not Munich.

To negotiate is not to appease. But we must understand very clearly what makes the difference between legitimate negotiation and inexcusable appeasement. Three requirements must be fulfilled if we are to come to the negotiating table prepared to seek reasonable adjustments without fear of succumbing to unreasonable demands. First, there must be unity of policy within the Western community. Second, we must be militarily prepared. Third, our people must understand the full gravity of the situation we confront. I want to ask you to think with me tonight about each of these requirements.

1. The unity of the Western community

First, the critical importance of unity. At Munich the democracies were not united. They were divided. The United States lived in the never-never land of isolationism. The Low Countries of Europe were neutrals. Britain and France were united, it is true—united in somnambulant apathy, anxious to believe the false promises of the dictators.

Happily, the situation is very different today. Yet there remains much to be done. We have achieved agreement on what we will not do.

We will not get out of Berlin, just because the Russians threaten us.

But negative agreement on what we will not do must now be transmuted into positive agreement on what we will do—what we will propose, what we will be prepared to give in return for what benefits.

This is our problem and our challenge.

The Western community is composed of free partners. The unity we seek must now be forged from the free give and take among partners in a common enterprise.

We must meet the demand for firmness on the part of nations most exposed to the Soviets—principally the Germans.

We must reconcile this demand for firmness with the opposing demand for flexibility on the part of other nations less exposed—principally the British.

We must understand the French desire for national prestige.

We must remain sensitive to German resistance to policies that appear to demand greater sacrifice of German interests than they do of the interests of the other partners.

We must never forget that all these points of view are legitimate.

The British, through their capable Prime Minister, Mr. MacMillan, demonstrate what we mean when we say that one can explore imaginatively and negotiate constructively while yet remaining firm.

The French, through their dedicated leader General de Gaulle, remind us that the unity we seek must be open enough to honor a genuine sense of national destiny.

The Germans, through the firm leadership of Chancellor Adenauer—who after so many years of invaluable service soon will leave the world of active politics—embody the vital quality of resoluteness.

Some people are distressed about the differences of view among the allies of the Western community. But the free discussion of our differences is a measure of our strength, and not our weakness.

The weak cannot expose their differences without exposing their weakness. So they conceal their differences—and remain weak. I am confident that in the process of reviewing and reconciling our differences we will emerge even stronger.

To achieve a united position among free and diverse peoples demands the utmost in good faith and consultative skill. But I am confident that we will achieve it.

It is quite possible that some of our present differences are the price we must pay for past negligence. We have tended to be fitful, not constant, in our consultations within the Western community. If we had worked a bit closer with our allies and strengthened the consultative process within NATO during the past 5 years, the task of achieving unity would be less difficult today.

Be that as it may, let us now accept the present crisis as an invaluable opportunity to fortify the unity of the Western community of nations. Without that unity, peace and justice surely will not for long endure.

If unity is essential for NATO, it is also essential within the United States. It has never been more important than it is today for the administration to consult with the opposition party and to establish the closest possible working relationship with Congress. Our delegation to the coming Foreign Minister's Conference ought surely to include Senator WILLIAM FULBRIGHT, the respected chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, and Senator ALEXANDER WILEY, ranking Republican member of that committee.

Finally, we should not ignore the importance of achieving unity and support beyond the confines of the NATO community. The United Nations may play a significant role at this point. Let's not hesitate, at the appropriate time, to place our case before this unique international body. The United Nations cannot solve our problems for us. It was never meant to be a substitute for the difficult foreign-policy decisions all governments must make. But it does present many opportunities for the execution of a responsible foreign policy. And no objective is more important than that of mobilizing the support of the many nations that share our concern for security and justice.

2. Military preparedness

The first general requirement for a responsible negotiating position is, then, unity. The second requirement is military preparedness. At Munich, the democracies were unprepared. They had to buy time to rearm. They bought time—with the only currency acceptable to the dictators, appeasement.

Military preparedness is vital. As Carl Sandburg once observed "the cockroach is always wrong when it argues with the chicken." The militarily weak always invite appearsement when they negotiate with the militarily strong.

Once again, our present situation is happily very different from that of the democratic leaders who confronted the Fascists at Munich 21 years ago. Yet there is little cause for complacency. We must put to work immediately the lessons of the Berlin crisis. For this crisis throws a bright light on our military position and shows us that there is much yet to be done.

Last weekend, before the 10th anniversary celebration of the NATO Council, President Eisenhower reviewed the military posture of the Western community. He fortified his optimism with scripture. "When a strong man armed keepeth his palace," quoted the President, "his goods are in peace." But Mr. Eisenhower neglected to complete the quotation which continues, "But when a stronger than he shall come to him, and overcome him, he taketh from him all his armour wherein he trusted and divideth his spoils."

I would suggest that we indulge less in self-congratulation and more in self-examination—and if necessary in self-sacrifice.

Many thoughtful men have been engaged in this critical self-examination. Many of them have concluded that our Defense Establishment is rapidly becoming inadequate in terms of the threat we face. If we allow our armour to become weak we may well suffer the fate of the improvident man of the scriptural story.

It is time we faced resolutely some searching questions.

Are we militarily prepared in relative terms, relative, that is, to present and foreseeable Soviet capabilities? And are we militarily prepared in relevant terms, relevant, that is, to the various military contingencies we may have to face?

Is our strategic force adequate—relative to the Soviets? General Power, head of the Strategic Air Command, said the other day: "I think our deterrent posture is deteriorating." The fact is that unless action is taken now we are going to find ourselves facing the Soviets with an old weapons system, we with our manned bombers, and they with long range missiles.

Is our Military Establishment relevant to the kind of threats we may have to deal with? The fact is that unless action is taken now we will run the risk of short-changing our forces in weapons appropriate to their job. General Lauris Norstad, commander of the North Atlantic Treaty forces, has asked for a new weapons system for NATO. His request has been given vigorous support by the President's distinguished Committee, headed by Mr. William Draper, and commissioned to evaluate our military aid program.

The increase in military assistance is to be primarily for new weapons in the NATO area.

The military balance of terror between East and West is a horrible thing. But this horror is exceeded only by the prospect of an imbalance of terror, an imbalance favoring the Communists. For them the cockroach would indeed find himself arguing with the chicken. To negotiate from military weakness is to invite appeasement.

If the Western community of nations is to endure, we must do what is necessary to maintain military parity with the Soviets—and do it now.

3. Public understanding

The third general requirement for a responsible negotiating position is public understanding. The appeasement of Munich was partly the product of popular misunderstanding. Most people thought that Czechoslovakia was a small, remote country, hardly worth bothering about—certainly not worth fighting over.

In a democracy, responsible policy cannot long maintain itself in times of crisis when the public is misinformed—or even when it is uninformed.

Again our situation today is happily very different from that of Munich. A recent New York Times survey of American opinion reveals serious concern about Berlin. The American people surely are not basically opposed to a responsible policy in the Berlin crisis.

But the Times survey also flashed some danger signals. Thirty-nine percent of the people interviewed did not understand the basic strategic problem we confront in defending free Berlin—the fact that it is located over 100 miles inside of Communist Europe. Right here in the New York area the percentage of uninformed people ran as high as 75 percent. Just as serious, most people were certain that the crisis would pass—that the danger was not great.

I do not believe we are at the brink of war. I too am confident we can contain this crisis. But we shall successfully avoid war and discharge our responsibilities to the people of West Berlin only if we understand the full complexity and precariousness of our situation.

It is not enough that our diplomats understand the problem. Our capacity to cope with the danger we now confront will not depend alone on the wisdom of statesmen meeting in Washington, London, Rome, Paris, and Bonn. It will rest finally on the understanding of the people from whom the statesmen draw their power.

Why do I say this? It is because people who have been given the facts may tend to expect too much, or may mistake legitimate negotiations for appeasement. People who do not know the facts—who do not know, for example, the complexity of the problems we face—may demand what is impossible. They may demand or expect a permanent European settlement with the Russians.

People who have not been fully informed—who do not know, how precarious our situation is—may shout "Munich" if our diplomats begin talking about limited agreements with the Soviets aimed at easing tensions.

It is my firm belief that the administration has not done a good enough job of informing the public in the interests of greater understanding. Now, what specifically are the ingredients of this understanding?

First, we must be openminded and imaginative. We must understand that negotiated agreements designed to reduce the hazards of war are not appeasement unless they alter the status quo to our disadvantage.

Second, we must be patient. We must understand that nothing will be solved overnight, that settlements will in fact take years, and that we face a long road of uncertainty and insecurity.

Third, we must be resolute and willing to sacrifice. We must be willing to spend money—hard-earned money—to do what is necessary to maintain the strength of the western community of nations.

The requirements of the present crisis are high. I came here tonight to speak about Berlin and the prerequisites of effective negotiation. I cannot leave without reminding you that the imagination, patience and resoluteness, which as a people we must now demonstrate, is necessary at every level in our contest with the Soviets—in aid, in trade, and in appeals to the minds and souls of men and at every point in our contest with the Communist bloc—in Asia, in the Middle East, in Africa, at the U.N.

WE ARE CALLED TO GREATNESS

I think I understand well the Communist threat. I have talked to Khrushchev. I have seen at firsthand his vigor, his determination, his ruthlessness. I know the power of totalitarian might. We must never underestimate this massive threat.

More to be feared than Soviet hardness is our own softness.

More to be feared than ruthless Soviet purpose is our aimlessness.

More to be feared than the pernicious appeal of Communist slogans to the disinherited of this earth is our own inability to develop a clear sense of purpose and to give mankind a vision of a noble destiny.

I do not believe the pessimists who say that as a people we Americans cannot or will not meet the demands of the present trial of Western civilization.

I do not propose that we chastise the American people.

I propose that we challenge them.

The measure of our responsibility is such that we must act with greatness. No people have ever risen to greatness without being called to greatness.

The tragedy of these years is that the voice that should summon us is silent.

NATIONAL YOUTH FITNESS WEEK, 1959

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, President Eisenhower has taken a constructive action, I believe, by designating May 3 to 9 as National Youth Fitness Week.

The objectives of this special week are: To endeavor to keep our youth fit, mentally, emotionally, spiritually, socially, and physically.

As we know, the President's Council on Youth Fitness works with local communities, through their agencies, organizations, and facilities, to plan and carry out fitness programs for their young people.

We recognize, of course, that the future of America depends upon the youth of today.

Consequently, providing ever-better opportunity for our youth, first, to develop their innate talents; second, to prepare for the responsibilities of adulthood, as individuals and as citizens; third, to be imbued with high principles, aspirations, and ideals; fourth, to be well trained vocationally, so as to experience personal growth, as well as make a maximum contribution to our social, economic, and cultural life; and fifth, to gain the overall capability and maturity that will be needed to meet the challenges of tomorrow.

The President's Council on Youth Fitness, of course, serves to generally direct this fine program. However, the major responsibility for effective planning and achievement in this field lies with local civic-minded individuals, groups, organizations, associations, and community leaders.

Recognizing the merits of a specially designated National Youth Fitness Week, I request unanimous consent to have the proclamation by President Eisenhower printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the proclamation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE.

NATIONAL YOUTH FITNESS WEEK, 1959—A PROCLAMATION BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

Whereas the ongoing strength of our Nation depends upon the health of our young people; and

Whereas we must always strive to improve the fitness of our youth by determined and coordinated efforts; and

Whereas, in this challenging world, it is essential that our young people recognize their obligation to themselves, to their families, and to the Nation, to endeavor to keep themselves mentally, emotionally, spiritually, socially, and physically fit; and

Whereas the President's Council on Youth Fitness has recommended that a National Youth Fitness Week be designated:

Now, therefore, I, Dwight D. Eisenhower, President of the United States of America, do hereby proclaim the week beginning May 3, 1959, as National Youth Fitness Week.

I request officials of the Government, and I urge parents, young people, and interested local and national organizations, to use all appropriate means during that week to promote programs and activities demonstrating the importance of youth fitness to the end that we may assure the continuing strength and well-being of our people.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington this 31st day of January 1959 and of the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and eighty-third.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

By the President:

JOHN FOSTER DULLES,
Secretary of State.

THE VICE PRESIDENT'S VISIT TO MOSCOW TO OPEN AMERICAN NATIONAL EXPOSITION

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I am delighted to learn of the decision to have the Vice President go to Moscow to open the American exhibit at the national exposition in July.

The trip by the Vice President will, I hope, shed new light on East-West relations, on obstacles to solving problems, and possibly provide new approaches for easing international tensions.

In our dedicated efforts to find ways and means for lessening the dangers of a missile-nuclear war that could destroy vast portions of the world, we do indeed need to be willing to leave our homeground occasionally—if this will serve the cause of peace.

During his tenure of office, the Vice President has served effectively and admirably as an envoy of good will for our country.

We recall, of course, that there have been circumstances, which were beyond his control, involving unfortunate incidents.

Over all, however, he has distinguished himself by realistic, intelligent statesmanlike efforts to establish stronger relationships with friendly countries and a better understanding of problems with other nations.

The Moscow exhibit, itself, scheduled to open on July 25, has been designed, of course, to convey a better understanding of our economic, social, and cultural life to the Russian people. The display will include, among other things, films, publications, art exhibits, and displays in science, technology, research, education, labor productivity, health, social services, agriculture, and other exhibits of our progress.

The objectives are to present to the Russian people an idea of how Americans work, live, play, and participate in community and national life.

The designation of the Vice President to open the U.S. exhibit in Moscow on July 25, I believe, greatly enhances the chances of its success, and may, perhaps, contribute further to a solution of East-West problems.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 1555) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PROXMIRE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

RURAL ELECTRIFICATION PUERTO RICO

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, I have just returned from a brief trip to Puerto Rico, where I was pleased to represent the Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on Agriculture at an official ceremony sponsored by the Commonwealth to dedicate unit No. 2 of the south coast steam electric station at Ponce-Guayanilla road. The first unit in this plant was placed in operation in February 1958. The second unit was dedicated on April 16, 1959. It is an installation which includes a combustion engineering boiler rated at 475,000 pounds of steam an hour, and a turbogenerator having a rating of 44,000 kilowatts and a maximum capacity of 56,000 kilowatts.

This new unit will serve more than 50,000 rural customers in Puerto Rico. It has been financed through loans granted by the Rural Electrification Administration of the U.S. Department of Agriculture, as were the rural electrification extensions which serve these customers. The new addition has been installed under the management of Mr. S. L. Descartes, executive director of the Puerto Rico Water Resources Authority.

Because of the importance of this development to the economy of the island, the water resources authority arranged a seminar on rural electrification with an appropriate program. Officials who have supervised the water power program in the island presented informative addresses, carefully detailing rural electrification during the past 43 years. Speakers included Rafael R. Ramirez, head of the power division; S. L. Descartes, executive director; Pablo Vazquez Calcerrada, executive director, social programs administration; Victor M. Cataldo, head of power utilization.

The history of rural electrification in the United States was described by several speakers on the seminar program, including David A. Hamil, Administrator, REA; Gen. Herbert D. Vogel, Chairman, Board of Directors, TVA; Herman D. Plavnick, Assistant to the General Counsel, U.S. Department of Agriculture; Milton Chase, Assistant Chief, Electric Engineering Division, REA; W. H. Eastman, Director, Southeast Area REA; and Clyde T. Ellis, general manager, National Rural Electric Cooperative Association.

Several official representatives were present from pan-American countries. They participated in the seminar and reported on some of the problems which they have encountered in rural electrification in their respective countries.

Mr. President, I had not visited Puerto Rico since January 1, 1949, when I attended the first inauguration of the Honorable Luis Muñoz Marín, the first elected Governor of the Commonwealth.

During the past decade, remarkable progress has been made in the island's industrial, agricultural, and business development. I was profoundly impressed by the exceptional improvement in living conditions, the removal of slum areas, and the modernization of agriculture. Recalling some of the observations I made a decade ago in the island's rural areas, I was very happy to observe the drastic transformation which is taking place. In driving many miles and in flying over some of the more inaccessible areas, I was impressed by the progress in agriculture. This includes the use of irrigation in some of the arid sections and the development of dairying, which we observed at the Lajas Agricultural Experimental Substation.

Our Government has provided valuable cooperation and financial assistance to the Commonwealth, and it is most encouraging to note that substantial progress has resulted from capable and effective leadership on the island.

Mr. President, one of the most interesting addresses during the seminar was the report on "The Rural Electrification Program in the United States," made by Administrator Hamil, of REA. I ask unanimous consent to have excerpts from Mr. Hamil's address printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the excerpts from the address were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE RURAL ELECTRIFICATION PROGRAM IN THE UNITED STATES

A generation is a brief span of time in the history of a national program. Yet in slightly more than a generation rural electrification in the United States has become a reality. It is indeed one of the outstanding social and economic developments in American agriculture of the 20th century. Together with farm mechanization employing tractors and other machines, and the agricultural sciences, rural electrification has brought about profound changes in farm living and in the productive capacity of the American farm.

Mechanization and electrification have come so swiftly that many do not realize how great a change has come about. It is by no means a stretch of the imagination to say that electricity and mechanization mean as much to rural areas as the assembly line, production control and automation mean to industry.

A visitor to the United States is usually impressed by the distances between farms. These distances were for many years barriers to electrified farming, for they meant a correspondingly high investment in electric facilities. The size of that investment discouraged many existing power suppliers from extending service into the countryside.

Largely for this reason, most early rural electric lines in the United States were extensions of urban systems, reaching out for a few miles from the cities and larger towns. Consequently, as late as 1935, electricity had been brought to only about 1 farm in 10. This compared unfavorably with some other parts of the world, even after allowing for the great distances between our farms.

In the depression year of 1935, our Federal Government became interested in rural electrification as a means of stimulating employment and providing a useful public service. Unserved farmers and other rural people of course supplied the impetus. After much discussion of various ways of inaugurating such a program within the framework of our system of free enterprise, it was decided that a Federal loan program was the most acceptable and promised the best results. The decision was followed by an Executive order creating the Rural Electrification Administration in May 1935. The following year the Congress of the United States enacted the Rural Electrification Act, which gave statutory status to the new agency.

That Act is the foundation of the rural electrification program of the United States as it is today. Under this Act, the Federal Government, acting through the Rural Electrification Administration, makes long-term, self-liquidating loans available to farmer-owned cooperatives, to electric companies and to public agencies. They, in turn, construct and operate the rural distribution facilities.

When this program first began, it was believed that existing suppliers would outnumber other participants. However, as it turned out, farmer-owned cooperatives make up the bulk of REA electric borrowers. The cooperative emerged as a local answer to a tough local situation—the lack of electric power and the lack of interest on the part of existing power suppliers in providing it. Farmer joined with farmer specifically for the purpose of organizing a cooperative. They did this in the face of the fact that many power suppliers at that time deemed the risks too high to justify any considerable extensions of their lines into outlying rural regions.

Many people still believe that because the Federal Government is the lender, it also operates the rural electric facilities it finances. This may seem like a logical conclusion. However, it is not so in actual practice. Electric cooperatives are privately owned enterprises organized under applicable State laws. So far as the Federal Government is concerned, they are subject only to such controls as are designed to protect the security of the Government loan. The cooperatives make their own operating decisions and hire their own managers and other employees. The rural people taking part in this program point to their systems as examples of a highly successful combination of Federal activity and free private enterprise. Independence is a virtue of farmers everywhere. The American farmer is no exception. The farmers who organized and operate the REA-financed systems are proud of the independence of their systems. I can assure you that they want no undue interference in the affairs of their organizations.

This joint effort by private enterprise and the Government has proved to be highly successful. Whereas only 10.9 percent of our farms were electrified in 1935, about 96 percent are electrified today. REA-financed systems serve slightly more than 50 percent of these electrified farms. The electric companies serve the bulk of the remainder, and some are served by municipalities and other public bodies.

When REA was established, many predicted that the farmer would use electricity only sparingly, to light his home and barn and to run a few household appliances. How wrong they were. Farmers are using electricity in more than 400 different ways, and new uses are being discovered every day. Farm consumption has risen year by year. During the past decade it more than doubled. The average farm on REA-financed lines consumed about 318 kilowatt-hours a month in 1958.

This high consumption did not occur overnight. Farm use of electricity rose slowly during the early years of the program. The American farmer and his family were not familiar with electric power. This early period served to introduce electricity to the farmer. They were feeling their way at first. Gradually, as they learned how to apply electricity to more and more farm tasks, their consumption of power began to rise. After this tryout period, the demand for power on the farm rose sharply year by year.

As a Colorado rancher, I am always interested in the stories of farmers all over the country, what they are doing with electricity on their farms, and what it means to them. Such stories come into the Rural Electrification Administration by the score.

An Iowa farmer tells us that electricity makes it possible for two men on his farm to do what four used to do—and with a reduction in operating costs. His corn averages around 100 bushels to the acre and requires a lot of handling. A 50-foot grain elevator powered by a 5-horsepower motor gets it into the bin without manual labor. One day he moved 400 bushels of grain from one bin to another, cleaned the grain, and filled the first bin. It took 20 minutes, and cost him a nickel.

With infrared heat lamps available for pig brooding, it is possible to have pigs farrowed earlier, while the weather is still cold, and to cut pig losses, which is another step toward greater efficiency and considerably lower per unit costs.

Electricity is an important ingredient in one Pennsylvania grower's production of certified seed. He uses 50 electric motors, ranging from one-twelfth to 7½ horsepower, in drying, handling, cleaning, treating, and bagging his valuable crop. During 1956 this farmer averaged 2,500 kilowatt-hours per month for farm and home jobs.

Electricity costing $56 enables a Kentucky farmer to pump irrigation water that increases his income from corn, tobacco, and beans by $1,000 a year.

The all-electric farmhouse also has made its appearance, in which the cooking is electric, the refrigeration is electric, and even heating is electric. You know, in most of the continental United States we do have to provide our own heat.

In some types of agriculture, notably, stock feeding, dairying, and poultry raising electricity has taken over so many manual chores that the operation has been called push-button farming by the magazine editors. We feel, however, that the application of electricity to farm chores has just begun.

Since 1935, REA has made loans to 1,050 organizations for the provision of electric service in rural areas. The loans amount to $3.8 billion. Of the borrowers, 950 are the farmer-owned type; 76 are the public-owned type; and 24 are electric power companies. The loans were made to finance service for more than 5 million consumers from 1.4 million miles of line. The typical REA electric borrower serves about 3,700 consumers and operates approximately 1,300 miles of line. It has received $2.9 million in loans.

REA makes loans for generating plants and transmission systems in instances where it can be shown that either a power shortage exists or a more economical operation will result. At present, 76 borrowers generate all or part of their power requirements. They operate 150 generating plants with a nameplate capacity of 1,013,115 kilowatts. However, borrowers generate only about 15 percent of their power needs. They buy 51 percent of their power from commercial utilities and the remainder is purchased from Federal and other public agencies.

Borrowers are paying an average price of 7.1 mills a kilowatt-hour for their power at wholesale. Rural consumers on REA financed lines paid an average of 2.6 cents a kilowatt-hour. Both prices are the lowest since REA was established.

An important development of the past few years in connection with generation and transmission is the growth of interconnection and integration of various power systems involving various types of ownership.

For a number of years, the electric companies of the United State have been engaged in varying degrees in joint planning for interchange of power. All of these arrangements had as their objective to improve service and reduce costs for the consumer. This is brought about by several factors—reduced investment in generation and transmission facilities, including especially the smaller percentage invested in standby equipment; reduced operating costs by better utilization of more efficient units and cheaper fuel; and reduced demand requirements due to diversity of daily and seasonal peaks of rural and other loads.

To an ever-increasing extent, the REA-financed systems are participating in such arrangements—with each other, with the Federal hydroelectric facilities and with the electric companies. Through such arrangements, we get maximum value out of our hydro developments because they are firmed up with the steam plants of the REA borrowers or the companies. Also, the rural systems have a market for their surplus power at off-peak times and can readily get peaking-power through interchange.

Among requirements of the loan agreement between the Government and the systems are that loan funds be used for the purpose intended; that construction meet acceptable standards; that rates be such as to pay all costs of operation and provide funds to meet payments of principal and interest as they fall due; and that service be extended to all in the area who want it where it is economically feasible. This latter is the area coverage principle, one of the cornerstones of rural electrification in the United States. Under this principle, the test is not whether an individual line or section will be self-supporting but whether the entire system is feasible as a whole.

REA borrowers have established a repayment record that has few equals in the history of American banking. They have returned to the Government $1.1 billion in principal and interest, including over $140 million in advance of due dates. Only 1 of our 986 active electric borrowers is overdue more than 30 days in payments amounting to $91,102. This excellent record is a high tribute to the integrity and efficiency of the people who organized and operate the REA-financed systems.

The rural electrification program has passed through what can be called its first stage. The goal of this stage was to make electric power available to unserved rural persons. It is now available; the backbone of a vast electric system to serve rural America is constructed. The unelectrified farm is very much in the minority today in the United States—a minority of about 4 percent. We shall continue to make every effort to get electricity to these still unserved farms. Many of them are located in remote places and present a hard problem. I am confident, however, that farms of this type in areas served by REA borrowers will be reached.

The end of the pioneering stage brought about a sharp shift in emphasis. Today the big task facing our rural systems is to provide enough power to meet a constantly rising rural demand and to operate their facilities on an efficient basis. As a consequence, a larger portion of REA loan funds has, in recent years, been going to finance facilities to increase the capacity of existing systems and to provide new power sources. The year 1958 is a good example of this trend. In that year, more than 55 percent of our loans went to finance system improvements and new distribution facilities. About 43 percent went for new generation and transmission facilities. The remainder financed consumer facilities.

Characteristics of the rural electric system in the United States are changing. This is reflected in the increasing number of nonfarm consumers being connected. Although in numbers of consumers, the program is still a farm program, the percentage of nonfarm consumers is rising. Last year the rural systems served about 2.5 million farms and an estimated 2 million nonfarm establishments. The latter included nonfarm residences and commercial and industrial enterprises. The systems are adding new consumers at the rate of about 120,000 a year, and about 75 percent of these new consumers are nonfarm establishments. It is anticipated that the number of nonfarm consumers on REA-financed lines will outnumber farm consumers within the next 5 to 10 years. Already the nonfarm consumers account for more than half of the total power load on the systems and they will undoubtedly account for a larger proportion of total power sales in the future.

In the United States many people are leaving the cities to live in the country. Modern highways have brought the rural countryside and the cities closer together. A new type of rural consumer, the wage earner who commutes daily to a job in a nearby town or city, has become a familiar figure in many areas served by REA borrowers.

The future of rural electrification gives promise of great opportunities ahead for REA borrowers, but it poses serious challenges, too. As the number of consumers climb and as they demand better and better service, rural utilities must supply the kind of professional management that a modern utility requires. Their engineering plans must look far into the future, for they must have the plant that it takes to supply consumers with all the electricity they want, no matter how high that demand climbs.

Based on their fine record of accomplishment over the past 24 years, we are confident that the REA borrowers will meet these challenges and make the most of the new opportunities for service.

RESOLUTION OPPOSING RELEASE OF ANY GOVERNMENT INVENTORY OF COPPER

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business, H.R. 3293, Calendar No. 145, be laid aside temporarily and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 181, Senate Resolution 101.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A resolution (S. Res. 101) opposing the release at the present time of any part of any Government inventory of copper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that articles and editorials published in the Daily Metal Reporter of April 17, 1959, and in various other journals be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles and editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Daily Metal Reporter, Apr. 17, 1959]

GOVERNMENT'S PENNYWISE, POUND FOOLISH COPPER POLICY

Pennywise and pound foolish, probably best describes the U.S. Government's copper policy, if those Washington officials who handle copper for the Government can be said to have a policy.

If the plan to sell 128,000 tons of nonstrategic copper over which the OCDM has jurisdiction was designed to bring in revenue to the Treasury, it was ill conceived and shortsighted and that is being very charitable to those who concocted the plan. If those in the OCDM and in any other Government agency that had a hand in this planning, were at all conversant with the copper market, they would have known that the mere announcement of the Government's intention to liquidate some of its holdings would have a depressing effect not only on the domestic but on the world's price of copper. Copper is an international commodity and what effects the domestic market has its repercussions in all centers of the world where copper is produced or sold. We say that the mere announcement of the Government's intentions was bound to have a depressing influence, and the actual offer of a tonnage for sale by the Government could cause prices to fall sharply. This is not mere surmise.

Early this month there were rumors that the Government planned to release copper. Prior to these rumors, the price of copper on the London Metal Exchange was £251 a long ton or about 31.37½ cents a pound. That was on April 6. The rumor reached London on April 9 and the price on the London Metal Exchange dropped £4 10s a ton, or about one-half cent a pound.

Once a rumor gets started there is no stopping it and not only does it gain momentum but it is likely to become greatly exaggerated. When it was found that there was substance to the rumor, the price in London on April 16 dropped to £229 15s a long ton, or approximately to 28.75 cents a pound. In other words, in a matter of about 7 business days, the London price dropped about 2.62½ cents a pound. What are the consequences?

If the Government had actually proceeded to sell its nonstrategic copper, it is a reasonable assumption that the price could easily have dropped to 30 cents a pound, even if the first batch that was offered for sale was only 10,000 tons. On a sale of 10,000 tons the Government probably could have realized $6 million. And, were the Government to continue offering more copper for sale, there is no telling how low the price might go.

We wonder if the Government officials who conceived the brilliant plan to liquidate some of the Government's copper holdings are cognizant of the fact that the Government still has outstanding floor price contracts with producers that obligate the Government to take in about 10,000 to 12,000 tons of copper each month if the price should drop to about 27½ cents a pound. The Government would be selling a tonnage with one hand and taking in an even larger tonnage with the other.

But what about the effect on the world copper-producing industry? In the first quarter of the current year the world's deliveries of copper to consumers amounted to 763,000 tons, according to figures compiled by the Copper Institute. This is at the rate of about 3,050,000 tons of copper a year. The drop of 2.62½ cents a pound in the London price referred to previously, on sales of 3,050,000 tons a year, would entail a loss on sales of approximately $162 million a year. The loss in taxes to the Chilean Government alone would probably be approximately $20 million a year, let alone the losses to other producing countries such as Rhodesia, Peru, the Belgian Congo, and to others.

The Government has already done a great deal of harm to the copper market, harm that cannot be fully repaired, because, as long as these 128,000 tons overhang the market, there will be the continued uncertainty as to when they are likely to be offered for sale. No matter what safeguards the Government may devise so as not to hurt the market, they are not likely to prove effective.

There is one thing that the Government can do, if it really wants to undo the damage that it has inflicted, and that is to take these 128,000 tons of copper out of the hands of the OCDM and place them in the permanent or supplementary stockpile. Once this copper is in the stockpile, then, according to the Stockpile Law 520, it cannot be released except by Presidential decree during a period of national emergency or, in times of peace, by congressional approval.

The copper industry has too much at stake to allow this copper to hang like Damocles' sword over the market. It's up to the Government to remove it and do so quickly.

PROPOSED SALE OF COPPER ORIGINATED AT WHITE HOUSE—BUDGET HASSLE, INFLATION BEHIND PLAN TO DISPOSE OF DPA METAL—STRONG SENATE OPPOSITION

WASHINGTON, April 16.—The proposed sale of copper from the Defense Production Act stocks, which was stymied by Senate opposition yesterday, originated in the White House and was part of a plan to liquidate a number of surplus commodities in order to balance the budget, American Metal Market learned from informed sources in the administration today.

In addition to copper, other commodities accumulated by the Commodity Credit Corporation, were scheduled for disposal.

Government officials who were in on the discussions said today that they were convinced that the proposed sale of copper was inexpertly handled.

They said that if congressional leaders had been consulted beforehand and shown that the disposal of copper and other commodities would be conducted in an orderly manner, the plan might have received approval on the Hill.

An entirely new disposal plan had been developed and would have been announced today, had not the decision been withheld as a result of congressional opposition.

BALANCE THE BUDGET

The liquidation of copper and other stocks held by the Government was designed (1) as an anti-inflation measure and (2) to help balance the budget.

It was not immediately determined whether the plan was one of the recommendations which may have been submitted to the President by the Committee on Inflation and Economic Growth, set up 2 months ago by the President and headed by Vice President NIXON.

Officials who were in on the discussions said that the proposed sale of copper did not draw opposition from the Department of Labor in the present instance. When it was proposed in 1956 that copper be sold from DPA account, to replenish industry stocks during a strike, Secretary of Labor Mitchell objected on the ground it would weaken the position of labor at the bargaining table.

The plan for the sale of copper on the open market would have been an orderly disposal with a minimum impact on the market, Government sources said today.

SENATE COMMITTEE ACTS

Meanwhile the Senate Interior Committee today moved swiftly to close the door on any disposition of copper held by the General Services Administration under Defense Product Act authority.

The committee voted out a resolution calling on the Office of Civilian and Defense Mobilization to direct GSA not to sell any of its DPA copper holdings. However, the approved resolution did not request that the DPA copper be place in the national stockpile, as was indicated yesterday when Senators JAMES E. MURRAY, chairman of the committee, and MIKE MANSFIELD introduced the resolution.

Subsequently the OCDM said it was actively reviewing the copper situation and indicated there was some likelihood that DPA copper holdings might be sold on the domestic markets in small quantities over a long period of time.

The OCDM supervises the Government's DPA holdings in metals which have been purchased under expansion contracts signed since 1951 as a wartime buildup.

The OCDM has the authority to dispose of these materials if they become surplus to the Government's goals for supplying U.S. industry during a national emergency.

Last year the OCDM revised its stockpile objectives from a 5-year emergency stockpile to a 3-year emergency holding.

However, the Government was still obligated under its DPA contract to continue buying copper and some other metals.

PREVENTED BREAK IN MARKET

The Senators and Congressmen who yesterday attacked the Government for considering disposal of copper on the domestic markets by the Government agencies openly declared today that they felt their prompt action had prevented the disposal of this copper which they believed would have resulted in breaking the market in that commodity.

GSA is believed to have on hand up to 128,000 short tons of copper in its DPA holdings.

BORROWING AUTHORITY NEEDED

The copper controversy which broke out yesterday on both floors of the Congress may also have been the result of a calculated political move in the struggle between the administration and the Congress over money.

The GSA is said to be short of money to pay its "put" right obligations to copper and aluminum producers who have been selling stocks of these and other metals to the Government under Defense Production Act contracts signed in the Korean war era when metals expansion was considered essential.

ODM and GSA must go before Congress this year to raise funds to cover such metal as may be put under these contracts. The Congress already has indicated it would not approve authorizing this money on a borrowing authority basis, which would place the money borrowed from the Treasury outside the obligations of the Federal budget.

ODM has been warned that it must seek the funds through regular appropriation channels, and this must be done in the near future.

The storm brewed yesterday in Congress by the possibility of the Government selling copper certainly must be interpreted as a warning that the Nation's industry would resist strongly such sales, to say nothing of the violent reaction that took place on Capitol Hill.

The fact is that the time is nearly due for the Federal agencies involved to come before Congress to seek, among other moneys, what they believe they will need to meet their "put" rights in fiscal 1960, and these "put" rights still involve copper.

INDUSTRY UNCERTAINTY—LONDON SAGS

NEW YORK, April 16.—The industry's reaction to OCDM's noncommittal stand on the possible sale of DPA copper has been universally hostile. The mushroom cloud of uncertainty cast over the market by the Washington developments has brought weakness to most prices. An exception is the 31½ cents primary producer quotation which is well sustained by heavy consumer demand.

In the key London Metal Exchange market today, quotations tumbled by the equivalent of three-fourths cent per pound at the first call. They steadied at the second call so that both spot and 3 months prices finished at £229 15s. per ton. This was a net decline from Wednesday of £5 15s. Trading was heavy with 5,700 tons changing hands.

Comment from London noted a weakness in the 32 cents U.S. custom smelter price as well as a dormant demand for copper in Europe.

Trade quarters calculated that today's closing price in London means that foreign copper can be delivered in the United States competitively with the 32 cents smelter quotations.

BELGIAN PRICE CUT MORE THAN A CENT

Following the heavy decline in the London market, the big Belgian Congo producer, Union Miniere du Haut Katanga, has reduced its electrolytic copper price to 33 Belgian francs per kilo. This is equivalent to 29.95 cents per pound, f.a.s. New York, a reduction of 1.12½ cents.

SMELTERS QUIET—SCRAP CUT ONE-HALF CENT

Custom smelters who were finding a receptive market for copper at 32 cents prior to the Washington news, cannot dispose of metal so readily now. One smelter today was able to report only a small sale and commented that buying interest was very limited.

In merchant circles it was reported that business was active at 31½ cents per pound.

Custom smelters this morning reduced their buying prices for scrap by one-half cent to the basis of 25¼ cents per pound for No. 2 copper scrap. Dealers say they are uncertain and nervous about the price outlook.

FUTURES FIRMER

Following the violent reaction of the New York futures market to Wednesday's news from Washington, today saw some recovery in prices on Comex. Closing quotations were up by 13 to 40 points from the previous day, although they were lower at the opening. A total of 686 lots or 17,150 tons was traded.

BRASS, BRONZE INGOTS DOWN 1 CENT

Following the lower prices paid for scrap, a leading maker of brass and bronze ingots in the East today reduced the selling price on all grades of ingot by a flat 1 cent per pound. Other firms followed.

A Chicago report indicated that Midwest ingot makers joined in the price reduction.

ADMINISTRATION DOES NOT INTEND DUMPING COPPER, GOLDWATER STATES

WASHINGTON.—Senator GOLDWATER, Republican, of Arizona, reported that the administration has no intention of dumping large amounts of stockpiled copper on the market but instead is trying to find a way to get rid of a little bit at a time.

Mr. GOLDWATER's statement came after the Senate Interior Committee hurried through a resolution expressing Senate opposition to rumored reports that the Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization may sell up to 128,000 short tons from the copper stockpile. The resolution, piloted by Assistant Democratic Leader MANSFIELD, of Montana, is slated for early Senate approval.

The OCDM, which administers the Government's stockpile, said Wednesday it is actively reviewing the copper decision and may make a decision on disposal later this week.

Mr. GOLDWATER, a high ranking member of the Interior Committee, told a reporter that he will seek a firm commitment from the administration that it plans no action which would depress the copper market. "I got the impression that they do not plan anything more than a very gradual disposal," he added.

The Senate resolution contends that release of the copper stocks would do "incalculable danger to the national security and to the economic well-being of the Nation."

OCDM can dispose of any stockpiled material surplus to Government needs. Officials of the agency have revealed that such a surplus exists in copper because of a change in the stockpile objective last year from one designed to meet 5-year emergencies to one aimed at meeting a 3-year war situation.

COPPER MARKET JITTERY

NEW YORK.—The markets for copper yesterday continued jittery, reflecting further the uncertainties created by word the Government is considering releasing copper for sale from its stockpile.

Copper price movements mostly were on the downward side again, with the London price breaking about three-quarters of a cent a pound to the equivalent of about 28.75 cents asked on the London Metal Exchange for immediate delivery metal. This was in addition to a three-eighths of a cent drop there on Wednesday.

Industry men noted that at the current London quotation it now becomes more profitable to sell foreign metal in the United States than to European consumers based on current quotations, even after payment of the 1.7 cents a pound U.S. import tax. The U.S. producer price is 31½ cents a pound, and the U.S. custom smelter quotation is 32 cents a pound.

Custom smelters cut their buying price for scrap copper one-half cent, putting No. 2 copper wire scrap at 25¼ cents a pound. This is equal to about 30¾ cents a pound for refined copper processed from the material and ready for shipment 3 months from now.

The big Belgian Congo copper producer, Union Miniere du Haut Katanga, cut its price by 1⅛ cents a pound to 29.95 cents a pound at New York and Antwerp. The New York price does not include the 1.7 cents U.S. copper import tax.

The resolution (S. Res. 101) was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the best interests of the country, from both the national security and economic standpoints, will not be served by the release of any part of any governmental inventory of copper at this time, but on the contrary incalculable damage to the national security and the economic well-being of the Nation would result by such action.

The preamble was agreed to.

STRATEGY FOR SURVIVAL—ADDRESS BY SENATOR JACKSON

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, yesterday the distinguished junior Senator from Washington [Mr. JACKSON] addressed the National War College on the need for a clear and goal-directed national strategy for victory in the contest with world communism.

His address deserves the widest possible study. It deals with one of the most critical problems facing this Nation. The Senator from Washington not only makes the case that we cannot win the cold war without a strategy for winning, but he offers constructive suggestions to remedy the situation.

I am glad the Senator from Washington is not letting the matter rest here, but that he will follow through on it in the Committee on Government Operations.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD the complete text of the speech entitled "How Shall We Forge a Strategy for Survival?" delivered by the junior Senator from Washington before the National War College on April 16, 1959.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOW SHALL WE FORGE A STRATEGY FOR SURVIVAL?

(By Senator HENRY M. JACKSON, of Washington)

Admiral Ammun, General Mundy, faculty, members of the National War College, and Industrial College of the Armed Forces, I am honored to have this opportunity to talk to you again. I thoroughly enjoy these occasions—above all the question period which follows this opening statement. So I will immediately get down to the presentation of my theme.

The central issue of our time is this: Can a free society so organize its human and material resources as to outperform totalitarianism? Can a free people continue to identify new problems in the world and in space—and respond, in time, with new ideas? I think you would agree with me that the answer to these two questions is now in doubt.

Only 1 out of every 16 people in the world is an American. We occupy only 7 percent of the earth's land. Yet we carry the major burden of creating a world environment in which the democratic experiment can survive and prosper.

In performing this task, a host of new problems crowd upon us: the rising nationalisms in former colonial areas, the mounting pace of technology, exploding population growth, atomic weapons in the hands of more and more states. And complicating all of them is the increasing severity of the Sino-Soviet challenge.

The danger of a shooting war is clear.

We should expand military programs to develop the strength we need to win any war that might be forced upon us. We ought—and I use the word deliberately, for it is fundamentally a moral issue—we ought to do whatever is necessary to win and hold a decisive lead in the race for new weapons systems. And, together with our allies, we ought to develop strength adequate to protect the free world with limited means against limited aggression.

It is absurd to say that we cannot afford to do these things. We cannot afford not to do them.

Could there have been anything more unimaginative than the defense budget ceiling of $14 billion in 1950—just before the Korean attack? In 3 years we had to treble our defense program, and we have maintained it at substantially that level ever since. Now even a $40 to $41 billion defense program isn't enough.

Yet our leadership has reverted to the arbitrary budget ceiling—an ideal device to obscure the real requirements of survival.

It is high time that we ceased being victims of a budgetary fetish. We should determine our defense needs in the light of the threat. Then we must find economically sound ways to meet those needs—by expanding our economy, and, if necessary, by providing more funds through additional taxes.

But today I wish to speak of the perils of the cold war. If we do what we ought to do militarily, we may not have a big shooting war. In that case, the decisive struggle of our time will be fought on the battleground of the cold war. And that is precisely the battleground where Premier Khrushchev thinks he can beat us, plans to beat us, and will beat us unless we get to work.

What is this cold war all about? It is a war to determine what kind of world system is to be created on this planet, a Communist world system or a world system in which free institutions can survive and flourish.

By outperforming us in one field after another, the Communists plan to demonstrate that their system represents the inevitable wave of the future, and that our friends and allies have no realistic alternative except to join forces with them.

Loss of the cold war could be as final, and fatal, as defeat in an all-out war. And now we are losing the cold war, when we could be winning it.

Our own power as against that of the Communist bloc is in decline. We are losing ground in one field after another—military power, economic strength, scientific capability, political influence, and psychological impact. We are going downhill at an accelerating rate—which is the normal way of going downhill. And if that is a joke, it is a grim one.

The results of a continuation of this decline can be predicted with almost mathematical accuracy. The combination of growing Communist power and weakening American power will produce a chain reaction of defeats for the free world. Finally, as the culmination of retreat, after retreat, after retreat, we will stand at bay—isolated and desperate.

There is no lack of good ideas as to what we have to do to reverse the tide of events. Over and over again lecturers here at the War College have said what we should do:

We should move faster to the invulnerable military deterrent, the Minuteman, and the Polaris missile system.

We should expand our economy at an annual rate of 5 or 6 percent, not 1 or 2 percent.

We should strengthen education across the board, especially in the sciences and foreign languages, but being careful not to neglect the social sciences, which are, so to speak, the sciences of the cold war.

We should increase our technical cooperation and development loan programs.

We should make a dramatic demonstration of our power to help the economically impoverished countries, and underwrite India's historic development program.

We should rally more of our best brains into public service.

We should be doing all these things—and many others.

Committee after committee has proposed programs to fortify our position in the cold war. Indeed, for every new crisis we seem to get a new committee.

It is a formidable succession—for example, the Finletter Committee, the Gray Committee, the Paley Commission, the Sarnoff Commission, the President's Committee on Scientists and Engineers, Citizens Advisers on Mutual Security, the Gaither Committee, the Draper Committee, the Boechenstein Committee—not to mention the Committee on Economic Development and the study groups of the Rockefeller Brothers Fund.

Over and over again these committees warn that we are losing the cold war. Over and over again they recommend policies to stem the tide.

Their reports are not refuted. But neither are they acted upon. They are simply referred to some other committee for study. After a decent interval, they are moved to some file drawer in the Pentagon or the State Department, there to await eventual transport to the National Archives and Records at Eighth Street and Pennsylvania Avenue NW.

And of what value are all the good ideas if nothing ever comes of them?

The truth is we know pretty well what we should do. The tragedy is we have not done it, we are not doing it, and we show few signs of doing it.

Why are the American people failing to pull themselves together and act on the good ideas available? What is missing?

Certainly we do not lack a worthy cause—freedom. Certainly we do not lack the capacity for hard work—that is our tradition. Certainly we do not lack material resources—we have plenty of them and we could easily have more. Certainly we do not lack brainpower—we have an abundance of that.

What seems most to be missing is a coherent and purposeful national program that sets forth in simple terms what we have to do to survive, and why.

In wartime, there is a basic strategy to defeat the enemy. Our leaders know, and our people know, what they are trying to do, and what is demanded of them. This makes possible the marvelous unity and energy of wartime.

We have no comparable strategy for the cold war. Our leaders do not know, and the people surely do not know, what our purposes are and how we propose to achieve them. The harsh tasks of the cold war are glossed over with soothing cliches and platitudes. Our people are never told what is required of them. The Congress is presented with only bits and pieces of policies—that give us no clear idea of what the executive branch is really trying to accomplish. And how can one expect to win any struggle unless one has a strategy for victory?

In this respect, the British in the 19th century were far ahead of us. The British leaders knew what they were doing and how they intended to do it. They were running a great empire and they had to maintain the freedom of the seas. Their people understood what was required—they were indoctrinated in their duties from the cradle. Everyone knew the importance of a good education, the need to train for posts throughout the Empire, the indispensability of a strong navy, and the significance of free trade.

During the 19th century the British people showed extraordinary energy and sustained a prodigious national effort.

By contrast, we seem to manage only sporadic effort. Comes a crisis we may arouse ourselves to take emergency action. We appoint a Science Adviser to the President, we rush wheat to India, we improvise an airlift to Lebanon, we consent to a summit meeting.

But at no time are the vital energies of our people fully engaged. At no time are our people shown the whole package of effort that is needed. At no time are the tasks of the cold war presented in terms that are meaningful to men at the work bench, to shopkeepers, to children in school, and to housewives.

In short—we do not have a national strategy that elicits the interest, support and continuity of effort necessary for survival.

How can we get that kind of a national strategy?

More dynamic leadership would, of course, help. There is no substitute for brains and firm direction of Government policy.

For example, when General Marshall reached the conclusion that we had to do something about Europe's economic plight in 1947, there was little problem in mobilizing talented people and public support to translate this idea into the highly successful European recovery program.

But it is not a satisfactory system that is completely dependent upon the personality of a single leader—or a handful of leaders. The stakes are too great for us to bank on the all-pervasive wisdom of our top leadership. We should have sound methods for preparing a national strategy—that will strengthen the hand of our leaders whatever their caliber, and make even an excellent leader that much more effective.

If we could get top-level officials to stay longer on the job, of course that would help.

I trust we can make some progress in this field, but we cannot expect spectacular results. A rapid turnover in top-level people is not simply the mark of the present administration. It has been true of every administration in recent times.

One thing I am sure would help—better machinery for policymaking.

Organization by itself cannot assure a strategy for victory in the cold war. But good organization can help, and poor organization can and does hurt. Let's face it: we are poorly organized.

Also, unlike some problems that confront us, that of organization is within the power of the Congress to tackle.

We now have an enormous executive branch and elaborate policy mechanisms: The Office of the President, the Cabinet, the National Security Council, and its two subsidiaries, the Operations Coordinating Board and the Planning Board. We have the Joint Chiefs of Staffs, the Office of the Secretary of Defense, the Office of the Secretary of State—departmental planning staffs, and hundreds of advisory boards, steering groups, interdepartmental committees, and special Presidential committees like the Draper Committee.

Yet this modern Hydra, with nine times nine heads, fails to produce what we need.

According to the chart it does the job:

The Planning Board of the National Security Council plans and proposes new policies and programs. These go for consideration to the heads of Departments who are members of the National Security Council. An agreed paper is approved by the National Security Council—which serves as an advisory board for the President. The President decides. The policy is then implemented under the watchful eye of the Operations Coordinating Board. And the President has a clear and consistent policy to spell out for the American people.

The procedure is pretty as a picture—and that is what it is, a pretty picture on an organization chart. It has little or nothing to do with reality.

First, the NSC is not and by its nature cannot be an effective planning agency, except in the most Olympian sense.

The President may and should make the most basic strategic decisions—such as the decision in 1941 to defeat Germany first and Japan second. In making such decisions the President no doubt needs the advice and counsel of an agency like the NSC. But neither the President nor the NSC and its Planning Board can make the detailed plans necessary to give effect to the basic strategic decisions. Planning of this sort requires the knowledge and experience of the expert, and also the resources and the environment of the Department having the main responsibility for the operations being planned. It is only in the Department concerned that the necessary conditions for extended creative planning work can be provided. And of course there must be cross-contacts and cross-stimuli between experts in the several Departments, at the level where planning is done.

The proper role of the NSC is to criticize and evaluate departmental planning and proposals in light of the knowledge, interests, and possibly conflicting policies of other Departments. In this way what we call a coordinated view may be developed, and such a view may be very helpful to the President in making a clear determination of the Executive will.

If, however, the official views of other departments are expressed at the planning stage, as they will be if planning is undertaken at the NSC level, compromise and departmental jockeying begin too early. The result is that clear and purposeful planning becomes almost impossible. The effort to make the NSC a planning agency, therefore, has been a serious mistake in my view.

Second, and again in the nature of things, top level officers cannot thoroughly consider or think deeply about plans. They need to be confronted with the specific issues which grow out of an effort to harmonize a new policy with other policies. The so-called planning board can be very helpful by identifying such conflicts, defining them sharply, and presenting the distilled issues to the top level for decision. This is an essential function—but it is not the first step in policy planning and should not be mixed up with the first step.

You know the typical week in the life of a Cabinet officer—seven formal speeches, seven informal speeches, seven hearings on the Hill, seven official cocktail parties, seven command dinner engagements. It is a schedule which leaves no time for the kind of reflection essential to creative planning. What they can do, should do, must do—and all that they should be asked to do—is to pass judgment on sharply defined policy issues.

Of course Cabinet members have the obligation to encourage and back the officers in their department who are charged with policy planning. The responsibility of the policy planner should run clearly to his departmental head. In this way staff planning can be geared into line decisions—and the authority of the departmental head can support and strengthen the hand of the planner.

But I am convinced that we will never get the kind of policy planning we need if we expect the top level officers to participate actively in the planning process. They simply do not have the time, and in any event they rarely have the outlook or the talents of the good planner. They cannot explore issues deeply and systematically. They cannot argue the advantages and disadvantages at length in the kind of give-and-take essential if one is to reach a solid understanding with others on points of agreement and disagreement.

Third, and largely for these reasons, a plan originating in the NSC will almost inevitably possess a fatal flaw; namely, a lack of internal consistency.

Good plans must be coherent; they must have sharp edges, for their purpose is to cut through a problem; their various elements must be harmonious and self-supporting. They must have the kind of logic, or, if you prefer, the kind of thematic unity which grows out of the uncompromising and uncompromised efforts of a creative mind. Compromise must come, but it should come after the planning process has been completed and as an adjustment of conflicts between a coherent plan and other coherent plans.

As you well know, NSC papers are in the end the result of compromises between different departments. That is as it must be. The question is: What should the NSC seek to compromise? My answer is that the NSC should be presented with the most sharply defined policy issues and choices, not with papers which have already lost their cutting edge by a process of compromise at lower levels. When compromise begins at the planning stage, the issues which come to the NSC have already lost their sharpness, clarity, and bite. The paper which is already inoffensive to every department may be easily approved, but it is also useless.

In short, plans which do not lead to sharp disputes at the NSC level are not good plans; they do not present the kind of issues which the top level ought to be called upon to decide in this hard slugging contest between the Sino-Soviet bloc and ourselves.

There is, I submit, a role for both chiefs and Indians, and only confusion can result when the Indians try to do the work of compromise which is the job of chiefs.

As it now functions, the NSC is a dangerously misleading facade. The American people and even the Congress get the impression that when the Council meets, fresh and unambiguous strategies are decided upon. This is not the case, though it ought to be the case. The NSC spends most of its time readying papers that mean all things to all men.

An NSC paper is commonly so ambiguous and so general that the issues must all be renegotiated when the situation to which it was supposed to apply actually arises. By that time it is too late to take anything but emergency action.

Fourth, national decisionmaking, as a result, becomes in fact a series of ad hoc, spur of the moment, crash actions.

Because the NSC does not really produce strategy, the handling of day-to-day problems is necessarily left to the Departments concerned. Each goes its own way because purposeful, hard-driving, goal-directed strategy, which alone can give a cutting edge to day-to-day tactical operations, is lacking.

Henry Kissinger has well described the kind of strategy which is the product of this process: "It is as if in commissioning a painting, a patron would ask one artist to draw the face, another the body, another the hands, and still another the feet, simply because each artist is particularly good in one category." It is small wonder that the meaning of the whole is obscured both to the participants and to the public.

Indeed, and this is perhaps the most serious criticism, our present NSC system actually stultifies true creative effort in the executive branch.

Because planning is supposed to take place at the NSC level, the Departments are relieved of responsibility for identifying upcoming problems and for generating new ideas and are even discouraged from trying. The Indians are supposed merely to carry out existing policy, not to propose new policy. The result is that a vast reservoir of talent goes largely untapped.

Creative thought generally springs from daily concern with real problems, from the efforts of operators to operate. The new idea seldom comes from the man who turns his mind to a problem now and then; it comes from the man who is trying to lick a problem and finds that he can't lick it with the tools he has.

The present NSC process, furthermore, has reduced the cross-contacts and cross-stimuli between the Departments and services at the level where planning and operating take place or should take place.

One reason for this is that, in principle, no contacts are needed if policy planning is reserved to higher levels, and the lower levels are supposed to restrict themselves to carrying out instructions. Another reason may be that when planning is reserved to the highest levels, each Department considers that it must prepare to fight a battle in the NSC for its special point of view. It, therefore, mobilizes itself for making its case in a manner that will support and show off the departmental viewpoint to the best advantage. Contacts with other Departments are discouraged because they might provide them with arguments with which to rebut the views of one's own Department.

The bankruptcy of the present NSC technique is dramatized by the administration's increasing reliance on distinguished citizens committees both to review past policies and also to recommend future action—the Gaither Committee, the Draper Committee, the Boechenstein Committee—and so on. These committees may come up with excellent ideas—though this is probably the exception, not the rule. But few of the ideas are used.

Once such a temporary committee has presented its report, it is obviously in a poor position to fight its suggestions through to a decision. And the fresher its ideas, the greater the need for a hard fight to overcome vested interests in current policy. The fate of the Gaither report is a classic case in point.

The sum of the matter is this: Our governmental processes do not produce clearly defined and purposeful strategy for the cold war. Rather they typically issue in endless debate as ot whether a given set of circumstances is in fact a problem—until a crisis removes all doubt, and at the same time removes the possibility of effective action.

I grant that the cold war challenges our organizational ability to the limit. Yet think back to what we accomplished in World War II. With the stimulus of war, we put together a clearly defined national program of requirements and priorities. Then we set national goals to meet them. And we exerted the needed effort. Between 1940 and 1944 we increased the real value of our gross national product by 55 percent, and while putting 11 million men into uniform and sending them all over the world, we were still able to increase the real consumption of goods and services by about 11 percent during that period.

Or think back to Korea. Between 1950 and 1953 we increased the real value of our gross national product by 16 percent, and while multiplying defense expenditures threefold, we increased the real consumption of goods and services by about 8 percent.

Can we organize such an effort without the stimulus of war? This is the hard problem of our time. Can a free society successfully organize itself to plan and carry out a national strategy for victory in the cold war?

I recently proposed to my colleagues in Congress that we make a full-dress study of this problem, with public hearings and a formal report. This would be the first congressional review of Government methods for formulating national policy in the cold war. The study would be conducted in a nonpartisan manner. We would not be interested in destructive criticism but in constructive help.

The general questions that need consideration run something like this:

1. What is the present structure for formulating national policy?
2. What is it supposed to accomplish?
3. Is it doing it?
4. In what areas are there grave shortcomings?
5. Why is this the case?
6. What improvements should be made?

We need to find out why critical issues constantly fail to rise to the level of national decision—in time. Experts down the line often see an issue, debate it, and write a paper about it, then the problem gets lost on its tortuous movement upwards through the layers of bureaucracy.

Over and over again, vital questions never get before top officials in such a way that those officials have to face them, take responsibility for them, and decide them one way or the other.

Might there be some way in effect to force top-level response to specific ideas and issues? For example, why did it take a letter from the Congress as late as 1955 to induce the President to receive his first full-scale briefing on the status of our ballistic missile program?

In addition, we should ask this kind of question:

1. Does a case history of NSC 68 reveal useful lessons for the future? This paper, which proposed a major defense buildup, was worked out in 1949–50, before the Korean attack, but it was signed by President Truman only after the attack. To my knowledge it is the first comprehensive statement of a national strategy.

2. Did the NSC fully consider the psychological impact of permitting the Russians to register scientific firsts in the intercontinental ballistic missile, in orbiting a satellite, and in sending a rocket beyond the moon? Was a decision taken that these scientific firsts did not matter?

I know there are some people who believe these scientific firsts do not matter. I think they are 100 percent wrong. The psychological impact of being the first to put a man on the moon cannot be underestimated. It will make an enormous difference to the in-between world and to the Russians as well—if they do it first. It will even give us cause to doubt our own abilities.

3. Has the NSC considered and decided whether or not to make it a goal of national policy to substantially increase our gross national product—say from 1 or 2 percent to 5 or 6 percent?

The difference between a 3-percent and a 5-percent rate is staggering. In 10 years—one short decade—our economy could turn out an extra $630 billion if we could step up our rate of growth from 3 percent to 5 percent.

If this goal has not been considered, who in the Government prepares the alternative policy recommendations on this problem? And who actually makes the decision?

4. Has the NSC prepared a paper analyzing the implications of an arbitrary defense budget ceiling both for our defense program and for the strength of our political and diplomatic hand?

5. How much consideration has been given to the implications of the use of nuclear weapons in limited war? How has this matter been presented to the President?

6. Has the NSC prepared a paper analyzing the alternative ways this country could support and finance an increased defense program? Has such a paper been discussed by the Cabinet?

7. Has the NSC considered the relation of our present output of scientists and engineers to the future needs of defense and welfare, and made alternative recommendations to the President?

At this point, you could legitimately ask what constructive remedies the Congress can hope to recommend?

I believe there are at least two main areas where Congress could made helpful proposals:

In the first place, better ways can be found to stimulate deep, sustained, creative thinking about the whole range of problems facing our Nation and society.

In this connection several possibilities suggest themselves.

Policy planning staffs could be set up in each main Department, with a position, role, and prestige like that of the policy planning staff in the State Department in the Truman administration.

Continuing staff relations could be organized between Defense and State, with the inclusion of other Departments as occasion warranted. These might center in joint meetings between departmental policy planning staffs, or the directors of policy planning.

Continuing cross contacts could and should be organized at other levels, like that between State and the Joint Chiefs of Staff during the Korean war.

The equivalent of a RAND organization might be organized for the executive branch, perhaps responsible to the Secretary of State.

An equivalent of a permanent Gaither committee could be organized in the form of an Academy of National Policy, outside the Government, but with access to classified information. The academy could draw on experts in defense, in the sciences, social sciences, and humanities, and on leaders from private life. Insofar as possible the academy's reports would be made public, as part of a continuing effort to develop an informed public opinion. In addition, the academy could also prepare confidential reports for use of the Government.

Unlike the Gaither and similar temporary committees, a permanent center would have a chance to build a reputation and tradition for responsible and helpful reports.

Second, better methods can be found to formulate and carry out a clearly defined and purposeful national program at the Presidential level.

Here again several possibilities suggest themselves:

The task of the NSC staff could be redefined as the identification and clarification of policy choices for the President and his principal advisers. Its purpose would not be to reach ambiguous compromises, but to sharpen policy choices in order to assist the President and the NSC to see the issues clearly and thus to decide them intelligently. This change would recognize, in organizational terms, that the proper role of the President and his advisers is to make choices between clearly stated and sharply defined proposals.

The central role of the Secretary of State could be affirmed by giving him primary responsibility for the initial presentation to the council of the NSC papers in which policy choices are defined.

The NSC staff could be reorganized, and composed of the heads of the departmental policy planning staffs, responsible to their department chiefs. That kind of a staff would be better prepared to define issues and thus to prepare the way for intelligent decisionmaking at the top level than the present staff which is responsible to an independent director.

In short, NSC staff papers could be shaped to force the careful weighing of alternative courses of action by NSC members, and to force the chiefs of departments and the President to make the choices between alternatives that they should make.

Let me say at this point we could develop excellent machinery and come up with all kinds of fine proposals—but if these proposals never reach the top level for decision, then we would be no better off than at present. We would be right back with the Gaither report. I am not sure what the full answer is. As I have indicated, this aspect of the problem must be thoroughly considered by our congressional inquiry. I am sure, however, of what we need and are looking for—a national policymaking system that by its nature gets critical issues, sharply defined, up to the highest level where a conclusion can be reached on them—in good time.

Finally, given the kind of national strategy I have been talking about, the Operations Coordinating Board would come into its own. There is a need for such an agency. The committee headed by William Jackson, way back in 1953, had a good idea. But the coordination of operations presupposes a guiding national strategy and the Operations Coordinating Board cannot coordinate because this precondition is lacking. It cannot direct until it receives strategic directives. It cannot wield the baton because there is no orchestra, only a collection of anarchic musicians each playing his own hot licks on his own instrument with his own music.

Of course, a new and better organization of itself is not going to be the whole answer. At best, organization can only help.

You know well enough how much we need vigorous and creative national leadership. Most of you know from personal experience the importance in high places of a hospitality to ideas. And there must be a recognition of the fundamental problem.

Perhaps I am wrong, but I think our fundamental problem is that we do not have a national strategy for victory in the contest with world communism.

At this point in our history, I believe there is no more important contribution that the Senate could make than to prod, poke, and irritate the executive branch into developing such a strategy and organizing our Government for that task.

And I do know this, and with the immodesty becoming a Senator I will assert it with all the force I have: without such a clear strategy, it will prove increasingly difficult to get the public and congressional support that is the essential underpinning of the adequate, purposeful, continuing action on which victory in the cold war depends.

It is far more difficult to generate the enthusiasm for the long drawnout efforts of the cold war than for the dramatic clashes of a hot war. It is on this fact that Mr. Khrushchev is heavily banking. All the more important, therefore, is the formulation of a clear and understandable strategy for victory.

In conclusion, let me just say this: We fail to act on the good ideas available. We fritter away our strength on secondary matters. We fiddle trifling tunes while the world burns. But back of all that—still the true glory of a free society is its central conviction: The world can be made a decent place to live in—a world of peace, material well being, justice, and freedom—a world in which no individual is lost and none is forgotten.

Free men are the real champions of the future. We are the bearers of the truly revolutionary idea of our age—that the quest for human welfare and the quest for human liberty are one and the same quest.

The truth is that to every threat of defeat there has always come the resolute response of freemen: "It shall not be."

This can be so again, as we in our time bend our efforts to building the decent world for which we stand—knowing that humanity's hope depends upon it.

AGRICULTURAL ACT OF 1959

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, many very important matters come before the Senate and House of Representatives. For example, today Mr. Castro is in Washington. His visit is important. At the moment, a number of luncheons are being held. Among the very important matters we have to consider is the foreign situation.

However, Mr. President, the subject I wish to discuss today, and in connection with which I shall introduce a bill, is, in my opinion, more important, or possibly it is the most important issue facing the Congress.

At this point let me say that last evening I mailed to each Member of the Senate and to each Member of the House of Representatives a copy of the remarks I shall make today, together with a complete analysis of the bill I shall introduce.

Mr. President, two groups are looking to us to solve the farm problem. When I say they are looking to "us," I mean they are looking to the Congress of the United States, because only the Congress can change existing laws, enact new laws, appropriate money, and give direction to the Secretary of Agriculture and to the President of the United States.

The two groups which are looking to us to do this are the taxpayers generally, and the farmers, specifically. The problem is serious for both of them. It is serious for the taxpayers because this year the cost of operating the Department of Agriculture will amount to more than $6 billion. I repeat, Mr. President, that the cost will be in excess of $6 billion.

The problem is very serious so far as the farmers are concerned because farm commodity prices are far too low in relation to production costs. I wish to repeat, Mr. President, that today farm commodity prices are much too low in relation to production costs.

Let me give an example of how serious this matter is. It is almost unbelievable, but it is true, that this year the cost of operating the Department of Agriculture, for all purposes, is estimated to be approximately $6,500 million. Yet the estimated net income of all American farmers for this year is a little more than $13 billion. Those facts ought to attract the attention of every Member of the Senate. In my opinion, those facts are much more important than the visit of Mr. Castro. Our Government, through the Department of Agriculture, is spending $6,500 million for all the purposes of the Department of Agriculture. Not all of that amount is for price supports, but the great majority of it is. Yet, as I have said, the net income of all American farmers is a little more than $13 billion. In other words, the Department of Agriculture is spending half as much money as the total net income of all American farmers; and I believe there are in excess of 5 million of them.

Another shocking fact is that the Government owns more than $9 billion worth of farm commodities, and the amount will increase to in excess of $10 billion worth before the end of this year. Those who are much closer to the situation than I am and are much better informed on these matters than I am say that if something is not done about existing laws and existing administration and unless some appropriate action is taken, the value of the farm commodities the Government will own will rise to possibly $11 billion, $12 billion, $13 billion, $14 billion, or $15 billion.

Mr. President, what is the problem? It is the low prices for farm commodities, because if there were not low prices for farm commodities, it would not be necessary for us to have any Federal legislation at all on this subject. If there had not been low prices for farm commodities in 1938, a price support law would not have been enacted at that time. If there had not been low prices for farm commodities in the 1920's, when, I believe, the first Federal legislation in this field was enacted, that action would not have been necessary.

So the problem is what to do about the low prices for farm commodities. Certainly there is no lack of production, and certainly there is no problem in regard to the quality of production, because the American farmers are producing huge quantities, and the quality is excellent.

Mr. President, what causes the problem? What has caused the low prices for farm commodities? I think the low prices have been caused by overproduction; and I think everyone agrees on this one point. Or, to state the matter in another way, the problem is due to underconsumption or lack of markets. So the trouble is either underconsumption or lack of markets or overproduction; all three of them mean the same thing.

There is another reason for the problem; and it should not be overlooked, because it constitutes a very serious contributor to the problem—namely, governmental laws, rules, regulations, and administration of the laws.

Mr. President, what did the Congress do about this problem? Possibly the Congress is responsible for the situation, because Congress has been passing laws in this field for many, many years.

We could forget the problem, or we could say there is no problem. We could repeal all such laws, and we could let the law of supply and demand prevail. In fact, I have heard many persons say that should be done; among others, I have heard Senators and Representatives say it should be done; and I, myself, have given a great deal of thought to that suggestion.

But when we consider and study that proposal, we come up against a stone wall: namely, the fact that the Government has on hand $9 billion worth of farm commodities, and soon will have $10 billion worth of them, and during the present calendar year has a contract with the farmers to support the prices of corn, wheat, and other farm commodities. So it would not be simple to repeal these laws.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield to me?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. MUNDT. Another difficulty, as the Senator from Indiana well knows—because for a long time he has been a careful student of this problem—is that to repeal all these laws and to let the law of supply and demand operate would be one thing, if we were living in an economy in which other segments of the economy followed that formula; but we cannot escape the fact that we are living in an economy in which the farmer is compelled to pay for the things he buys in conformity with restrictions and regulations which are replete in our economy, as it functions today. The farmer is a great consumer. Consequently, a wage-hour contract which is legitimatized and legalized by law has its impact upon the farmer. Similarly, the minimum wage law has its impact upon the farmer. Each of the various regulations by the Interstate Commerce Commission of the transportation rates has its impact upon agriculture, as does the fact that the Government has adopted, as standard operating procedure, the provision of grants in aid, subsidies, and floors or guaranteed returns for manufacturers who have military equipment contracts or contracts with the U.S. Maritime Commission or contracts to supply the aviation needs of the Government.

So it is somewhat unrealistic to say that, "After all, a laissez faire economy might have its merits, and we will try it out on the farmers." But it cannot be done in an era and in an economy in which other segments are undergirded, reinforced, and supported by Government grants and aid by way of legislation. As a consequence, national legislature must find some way to enact legislation which will protect the farmer and promote his interests in a period when other segments of our economy, almost without exception, have Federal agencies, commissions, boards, guarantees, and aids protecting them in their places in the economy.

Mr. CAPEHART. I thank the Senator from South Dakota. There is no question that what he has said is correct. We must do something, and do it quickly, because the problem will not solve itself.

Let me give the Senate another startling statistical fact, at this point, because I think it is a good place to do so when I make the statement that the problem is not going to solve itself.

Since 1933 the American taxpayers have put up $30 billion to support farm prices; and $15 billion of that amount has been spent in the past 6 years. The other $15 billion was spent in 21 years. That is proof positive that, from the taxpayer's standpoint, the situation is becoming progressively worse.

I do not believe the taxpayers would object to the expenditure of the $30 billion, or the $15 billion in the past 6 years, had the expenditures accomplished the purpose for which they were intended, namely, the maintenance of fair prices for agricultural commodities. But the program has not brought about that result. The situation is that the taxpayer is putting up vast sums of money for a program which is not working, and the farmers are not deriving any benefit from it. As I have said, this problem will not solve itself, and I think we may as well make up our minds to that fact.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Does the Senator believe lowering price supports would help solve the problem? We have been lowering them every year for several years, and it seems to me conditions are growing worse all the time. Does the Senator agree?

Mr. CAPEHART. I certainly agree that, to the extent the system we have been using is not working, farm prices are no higher than they were years ago. I certainly agree that has been the end result.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Our largest surpluses are in commodities for which price supports have been lowered the most, such as wheat and corn.

Mr. CAPEHART. I think that is correct.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. I commend the Senator from Indiana for the work he has done in the field of agricultural legislation. It seems to me we must ever be mindful of the fact that agriculture has changed in recent years. I refer to the high cost of operating farms, which is reflected not only in what might be termed inflation, but by the fact that the methods of farming have changed.

There was a time when, if a farmer had a poor crop or had received exceedingly low prices, he worked all year for nothing. But, as one Nebraska farmer pointed out to me, in these days by the time he has repaired his expensive machinery and purchased certified seed, fertilizer, tractor fuel, and all the other items of cash expense, it has cost him $7,000 in a certain year to find out he has not made any profit.

A quarter of a century ago the picture was different. The farmer would have worked all year for nothing, but his cash outlay would not have been so great. Consequently, the actual net income of the farmers is too low; and when I refer to the farmers, I mean families that live on the farms and whose sole business is farming. The very purpose of the agricultural program is to increase the income of the farmers.

I especially wish to commend the distinguished Senator from Indiana for including in his bill a measure which passed the Senate last year—and a similar bill has already been reported by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry—dealing with new industrial uses for farm products. I believe there are very real possibilities in that field. It is the one ray of hope we have of increasing the consumption of agricultural products. I commend the Senator from Indiana for including in his measure the section dealing with new industrial uses for farm products.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I said a moment ago that we must do something, and that we must do it quickly. I have suggested a three-point program. Senators may disagree with parts of it, or perhaps disagree with all of it. But if Senators do disagree with parts of it or all of it, I ask them to offer a program of their own for solving the problem, or to offer amendments to my suggestions, because I think the situation has reached such a point that we must take some legislative action.

I have no particular pride of authorship. I am interested principally in one thing, namely, my desire to help solve this most troublesome and expensive problem. I know there is enough intelligence and experience in the U.S. Congress and the administration either to alleviate or greatly improve the farm situation, if we will only seriously and intelligently undertake it.

I shall now give the ideas, in brief, covered by the bill which will shortly be introduced.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. MUNDT. Before we come to the Senator's constructive suggestions—which I may say I am eager to hear—I think it should be pointed out that, with respect to the figures quoted a moment ago, $30 billion in all, and $15 billion in the past 6 years.

Mr. CAPEHART. I said the Federal Government had spent $30 billion since 1933 in supporting farm prices.

Mr. MUNDT. And $15 billion in the past 6 years.

Mr. CAPEHART. Fifteen billion dollars in the past 6 years and fifteen billion dollars in the first 21 years.

Mr. MUNDT. I think it should be pointed out in both instances that those amounts do not represent a net expenditure. Perhaps we should think of the expenditures as being within the framework of a program in which the Federal Government has devoted that many billions of dollars to the price-support program; but, of course, substantial sums can be, have been and will continue to be recaptured as a result, for example, of the operations of Public Law 480, and some of the expenditures should be charged to it. Some of the money has been devoted to loans. In addition, of course, at the present time the Commodity Credit Corporation has a very sizable inventory of farm commodities which are not going to be a total loss. We are hopeful, if the Senator's new farm bill, or any farm bill, or a particular development, will raise farm prices, the losses to the Commodity Credit Corporation may be even more substantially minimized.

Mr. CAPEHART. There can be no question that some of the inventories on hand will offset some of the expenditures; but the fact remains that the American taxpayers have put up $30 billion. We may get some of it back. I hope we will. There is a sizable stockpile in existence at the moment.

Mr. MUNDT. I merely wanted to be sure that no city slicker or slick magazine reporter would say that all this money had been put into the agricultural economy or funneled out to the farmers, because substantial amounts of it will be recaptured, and, furthermore, not a very large percentage of the expenditures has ended up in the pockets of the farmers.

Mr. CAPEHART. The unfortunate situation is not the fault of the farmer. It is not the fault of the taxpayer. It is simply the fault of the law and the way the law works, since it has not accomplished the purpose for which it was intended.

From the very beginning the farm law was designed to raise farmer's prices in the open market so that the prices would be satisfactory. The law has not worked that way at all.

The only time when the Federal Government or the taxpayer has to spend any money under a price support policy is when the market price is lower than the support price and the farmer delivers his product to the Government instead of to the open market.

Mr. MUNDT. The Senator is exactly correct. Consequently, if in our collective judgment we can find a way to increase the prices received by the farmers, we will immediately reduce or eliminate the drain upon the taxpayers and the Government.

Mr. CAPEHART. Let us put it this way: We have $9 billion worth of commodities on hand now.

Mr. MUNDT. That is correct.

Mr. CAPEHART. At the time the Government took possession of those commodities from the farmers, if the free market price had been higher than the support price the Government would not have taken 1 penny's worth.

Mr. MUNDT. The Senator is exactly correct.

Mr. CAPEHART. The purpose of the program from the beginning—and it ought to be the purpose today—has been to do those things which would keep the market price above the support price. Even then the market price has to be a satisfactory price, in line with parity, taking into consideration the prices the farmer has to pay for what he buys.

Mr. MUNDT. Our program should be tailored to the goal of channeling to the farmer a payment for the product he raises, rather than having so much of the money spent in storage charges. The money goes to the terminal elevator or the warehousemen, who receive legitimate pay, but this process adds up to tremendous amounts for the storing of surplus grains which the Government would not own if we could figure out a program to provide for the farmer himself the parity level prices to which he is entitled.

Mr. CAPEHART. We either ought to give the farmers and the taxpayers a "run for their money" with a program and laws which will work, or the Government should get completely out of the farming business by repealing the applicable laws and letting the farmer run his own business. We ought to do one or the other.

Mr. President, I should like briefly to present the ideas I have in mind which are covered by the bill which will be shortly introduced. At this point, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to be known as the Agricultural Act of 1959. I ask unanimous consent that a detailed summary of the bill, and the bill itself, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the summary and bill will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 1722) to reduce temporarily the production of farm commodities through the storage of surplus acreage, to discontinue certain sales of accumulated surplus stocks of such commodities, and to provide for programs of study and research for the purpose of finding new industrial uses for such commodities, thereby stabilizing prices of agricultural commodities and making possible the discontinuance of price support payments, introduced by Mr. CAPEHART, was received, read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a detailed summary of the bill and the bill itself be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the summary and bill were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(b) Commodities referred to in subsection (a) may be disposed of, in accordance with directions of the President, as follows:

(1) Donation, sale, or other disposition for disaster or other relief purposes outside the United States pursuant to and subject to the limitations of title II of the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954:

(2) Sale or barter (including barter for strategic materials) to develop new or expanded markets for American agricultural commodities, including but not limited to disposition pursuant to and subject to the limitations of title I of the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954;

(3) Donation to school-lunch programs;

(4) Transfer to the national stockpile established pursuant to the Act of June 7,

1939, as amended (50 U.S.C. 98–98h), without reimbursement from funds appropriated for the purposes of that Act;

(5) Donation, sale, or other disposition for research, experimental, or educational purposes;

(6) Sale for new or byproduct uses;

(7) Donation, sale, or other disposition for disaster relief purposes in the United States or to meet any national emergency declared by the President;

(8) Sales at not less than the current parity price for such commodity, plus reasonable carrying charges, whenever the President determines that because of a shortage of the commodity such sale is necessary to prevent hardship;

(9) Donations to penal and correctional institutions in accordance with section 210 of the Agricultural Act of 1956.

(10) Sales for export;

(11) Dispositions authorized by section 416 of the Agricultural Act of 1949; and

(12) Sales for the purpose of rotating stocks or consolidating inventories, any such sale to be offset by purchase of the same commodity in a substantially equivalent quantity or of a substantially equivalent value.

(c) Strategic materials acquired by the Commodity Credit Corporation under paragraph (2) of subsection (b) shall be transferred to the national stockpile established pursuant to the Act of June 7, 1939, as amended, or to the supplemental stockpile established by section 104(b) of the Agricultural Trade Development and Assistance Act of 1954, and the Commodity Credit Corporation shall be reimbursed for the value of the commodities bartered for such strategic materials from funds appropriated pursuant to section 8 of such Act of June 7, 1939, as amended. For the purpose of such reimbursement, the value of any commodity so bartered shall be the lower of the domestic market price or the Commodity Credit Corporation's investment therein as of the date of such barter, as determined by the Secretary of Agriculture. In order to make payment to the Commodity Credit Corporation for any commodities so transferred to the national stockpile or the supplemental stockpile, there are hereby authorized to be appropriated amounts equal to the value of any commodities so transferred. The value of any commodity so transferred, for the purpose of this section, shall be the lower of the domestic market price or the Commodity Credit Corporation's investment therein as of the date of transfer to the stockpile, as determined by the Secretary of Agriculture.

TITLE III—DEVELOPMENT OF INDUSTRIAL USES

SEC. 301. The Congress of the United States hereby makes the following declarations and findings concerning the development of new and improved uses for farm products, new crops to replace those now in surplus, and the disposal of surplus commodities owned by the Government:

(a) Farms in the United States have a capacity to produce more farm products than can now be marketed at prices that will return sufficient incomes to farmers to maintain an efficient and progressive agricultural industry.

(b) A prosperous agriculture will contribute immensely to national welfare by efficient production of needed food, feed, and fiber, by provision of raw materials for the transportation and processing industries, by purchases of production supplies, and by its contribution to maintenance of a balanced and high-level national economy.

(c) National defense and security interests of the United States require protection of agricultural resources against deterioration and the maintenance of high productive capacity in order to meet possible emergency needs of the United States and other friendly nations.

(d) Basic research in agricultural products and their uses is essential in any long-range program of benefit to agriculture.

(e) Research programs to develop new and improved uses for farm products and new farm products have potentialities for providing outlets for a larger volume of farm production and greater stability of the prices of farm commodities.

(f) Public and private research agencies, including the Departments of Agriculture and Commerce, and land-grant colleges, other universities and research institutions, as well as private firms, can and should be utilized for an all-out attack on development of new and improved uses, and new and extended markets and outlets for farm products and byproducts. Research, pilot plant, development and trial commercialization work and corollary economic and related studies should be devoted to the expansion of industrial uses for agricultural commodities in surplus and to any food and feed uses and replacement crops that can make substantial contributions toward the solution of the surplus problem. Facilities should be established as needed to permit adequate experimentation and testing, and production and market development, of promising new uses and new products.

(g) Development of new and improved industrial and other uses of farm products and new farm products and new and extended markets and outlets for farm products and byproducts will enlarge income opportunities for farmers. It also will reduce Government costs for acquisition, storage, and ultimate disposition of commodities now in surplus.

(h) Disposition of a portion of the surplus stocks of the Commodity Credit Corporation through industrial channels for new or byproduct uses, so that the carryover of any commodity beyond the needs of the Nation can be reduced, will have a stabilizing effect on the market prices for farm commodities.

SEC. 302. There is created and established in the Department of Agriculture an agency of the United States to be known as the Agricultural Research and Industrial Administration, all of the powers of which shall be exercised by an Administrator, under the general direction and supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for a term of 6 years and who shall receive basic compensation at the rate of $20,000 per annum. The duties of this agency shall be to coordinate and expedite efforts to develop, through research, new industrial uses, and increased use under existing processes, of agricultural products; to develop new replacement crops; and to reduce the stocks of commodities owned by the Commodity Credit Corporation.

SEC. 303. The positions of three Deputy Administrators of the agency shall be in grade GS–18 of the General Schedule established by the Classification Act of 1949, as amended. Such positions shall be in addition to the number of positions authorized to be placed in such grade by section 505 (b) of such Act. The agency is authorized to fix the compensation, notwithstanding other provisions of law, for not more than ten positions which require the services of especially qualified scientific or professional personnel: Provided, That the rates of basic compensation for positions established pursuant to this provision shall not exceed the maximum payable under the Act of August 1, 1947 (61 Stat. 715), as amended and supplemented. The agency may appoint and fix the compensation of any technically qualified person, firm, or organization by contract or otherwise on a temporary basis and for a term not to exceed 6 months in any fiscal year to perform research, technical, or other special services, without regard to the civil service laws or the Classification Act of 1949, as amended.

SEC. 304. The agency shall have power and authority, within the limits of the funds made available to it, to coordinate and expedite activities toward research, pilot plant, development, trial commercialization and industrial uses, with Federal and State Governments, educational institutions, private research organizations, trade associations, individuals and industrial corporations in expanding the industrial utilization of the products of farm and forest and the development of new crops. In the discharge of these duties, the agency is empowered to:

(a) Make use of the facilities of the Department of Agriculture and other Federal departments and agencies, land-grant institutions, and experiment stations. The agency shall utilize existing facilities owned or controlled by the Federal Government to the greatest extent practicable, including pilot plants, regional laboratories and other facilities and equipment, and is authorized to utilize authority now available to the Secretary of Agriculture under existing law;

(b) To make grants, for periods not to exceed five years duration, to State agricultural experiment stations, colleges, universities, and other research institutions and individuals;

(c) Contract with foreign individuals, organizations, institutions of learning, or private corporations where payment can be made in foreign currency accumulated under Public Law 480, Eighty-third Congress. The agency is hereby authorized to utilize such foreign currencies notwithstanding other provisions of law requiring reimbursement;

(d) To make contracts or cooperative arrangements in the manner provided by sections 10(a) and 205 of the Act of August 14, 1946 (7 U.S.C. 427i, 1624), including contracts and agreements providing for the commercialization, market acceptance, and the economic feasibility of industrial utilization in the competitive market for agricultural products and processes with respect thereto;

(e) Extend suitable incentives to farmers or to industry to hasten the establishment of a new crop or of a new industrial use, where such appear likely to lead to durable additional markets;

(f) Direct the Commodity Credit Corporation to make delivery of any of its stocks of commodities to agencies of the Govenment, persons, or corporations designated by the agency where such stocks are to be used for (A) research, (B) pilot plant operation, (C) trial commercialization, (D) export of manufactured products, or (E) new or byproduct uses. The Commodity Credit Corporation, with respect to commodities thus requisitioned by the agency, shall pay necessary handling and delivery charges to the destination directed by the agency. Such sums of money as the agency shall receive, if any, on such transfers of commodities, shall be turned over to the Commodity Credit Corporation;

(g) To make contracts or leases for the private operation of any property or facilities transferred from another Government agency pursuant to this title or other legislative authority;

(h) To make loans or grants to those with whom contracts or other arrangements are entered into, for the purpose of providing assistance in the acquisition or expansion of facilities and equipment for research or development activities;

(i) Provide in all contracts for the disposition of inventions produced thereunder in a manner calculated to protect the public interest and the equities of the individual or organization with which the contract or other arrangement is executed: Provided, however, That nothing herein shall be construed to authorize the agency to enter into any contractural or other arrangement inconsistent with any provision of law affecting the issuance or use of patents;

(j) To grant exclusive licenses with or without payment of royalty for a fixed period of not to exceed five years for the use of patents under the control of the Department of Agriculture;

(k) To pay incentive awards to private citizens for suitable and acceptable suggestions to implement the program established by this title, such payments to be made in accordance with previously published rules stating the amounts of, criteria for determining, and subjects of such awards; and

(l) To test production procedures on a commercial basis, maintain and operate manufacturing facilities where necessary to prove the commercial feasibility of volume production, and to build, purchase, or lease plant facilities, or necessary equipment suitable for manufacturing needs.

SEC. 305. The agency may provide graduate scholarships and fellowships and for this purpose may make grants to individuals: Provided, That such individuals agree to pursue courses in an accredited college or university in the United States leading to a degree or degrees in a science or field of study having application in agricultural research: Provided further, That the initial grants in any one year may be made to individuals to attend any one institution in a number not exceeding 1 per centum of the student body.

SEC. 306. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, any Government agency holding any Government-owned facility useful in the program authorized by this title is authorized to transfer such facility to the agency, for use in the program, if requested to do so by the agency, provided such transfer has the approval of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget. The agency is authorized to exercise, with respect to the facilities transferred, all of the authority vested in the agencies transferring such facilities. At the time of such transfer, funds and personnel related to the operation or administration of such facilities, shall, with the approval of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, also be transferred to the agency.

SEC. 307. The terms "agricultural products" and "farm and forest products" as used in this title shall have the same meaning as the term "agricultural products" in section 207 of the Act of August 14, 1946 (7 U.S.C. 1626).

SEC. 308. The Administrator shall present annually to the Congress not later than the 20th day of January in each year a full report of his activities under this title.

SEC. 309. The authorities under this title are in addition to and not in substitution for authorities otherwise available under existing law.

SEC. 310. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this title.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, we should make this bill the starting point from which we can get the best ideas of all interested persons.

I confess that I have changed some of my ideas on this subject because I believe present conditions, experience, and the end results of our present and past laws and policies, have failed to accomplish the purpose for which they were intended; namely, to increase farm prices and get the taxpayer out of the farming business. My question to all Senators is, Will they change their opinions? It never injures anyone to admit he may be wrong once in a while. I find, with respect to the farm problems, that many are unwilling to admit they may have been wrong in respect to some of the things they have advocated.

The purpose of the three-point program which is covered by the bill I have introduced today is as follows:

First. To reduce the number of tilled acres by approximately 20 percent until, by research utilization, we can find new and increased uses in industry for farm commodities and new and expanded markets, and until our population increase has a greater impact on total food consumption.

In other words, one purpose is to reduce production until the time when, through research, we can find new uses for farm products in industry, and new markets, and until the population can help absorb the large production of which American farmers are capable.

If Senators can tell me any other way in the world to solve the farm problem without bankrupting the taxpayers, I shall be glad to listen.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. I know the Senator introduced a bill in past years, and I think this year, to establish an agency for research into the industrial uses of farm commodities. I know several years ago either the President of the United States or the Secretary of Agriculture—I do not now remember which—appointed an outstanding group of men to make studies in this field, and recommendations were made by that group.

Many of us have supported the Senator's bill to provide research into the industrial uses of agricultural commodities, so I should like to ask the Senator, is anything being done about that matter?

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, the answer is "No," I presume. However, the Senator will remember, of course, that last year the Senate passed a research bill. I am incorporating that bill as a part of the omnibus bill. My bill was passed last year by a vote of 82 to 0, but because of a lack of time it was not passed by the House.

Mr. COOPER. I know the Department of Agriculture has certain programs for research into the industrial uses of agricultural commodities. I know the land-grant colleges study the matter. Is there any strong and coordinated program?

Mr. CAPEHART. The answer is "No." Nobody is "crashing" the program. Nobody is pushing the program with all he has at his command. There are not sufficient funds in the Department to do that, and new legislation is needed. The bill I have introduced today will give the Department the necessary legislation. The bill introduced today includes the same bill the Senate passed a year ago.

Mr. COOPER. I join with the Senator. I do not care to interrupt him, but I should like to say that the chief source of income and the chief interest in my own State, which is a State neighboring Indiana, is agriculture. I am very much interested in the proposal of the Senator from Indiana. I think it is good for the Senator to make this creative effort toward a farm program. I have not studied it fully, but I am glad to have the Senator put forth this effort.

Mr. CAPEHART. I appreciate the remarks of the able Senator from Kentucky.

I will say again, as I have previously stated, the solution of the farm problem will require the wisdom of all Senators, of all Representatives, and of the administration. By introducing the bill I am not trying to suggest the ultimate answer, but to provide a starting point. We must get started, because conditions will grow worse instead of better. It is well for us to face the issue, and that I am trying to do. My object is to impress upon the majority of the Congress, to impress upon our friends who control the committees and who control both Houses of Congress, that a solution of the problem is their responsibility, as well as the responsibility of the minority.

I now will state the second of the points to which I was referring.

Second. To increase the purchasing power of our farms through higher commodity prices.

Third. Last, but not least, to reduce the taxpayers' load by greatly reducing the cost, looking to getting the Government and the taxpayer in a few years completely out of the farm business.

Senators will agree that these are the ultimate objectives of any sound farm program.

In other words, a farm program which does not accomplish the three objectives I have enumerated is simply not a sound program.

The question is, What is the best way to get the job done? As I have said, my bill proposes for the consideration of Senators a three-point program:

First. Take out of production 40 million acres of land producing those crops now covered by existing price-support legislation and pay the owners thereof $25 an acre. This would not in any way affect the present soil-bank conservation reserve program.

Second. Do a real "crash" job under proper Government financing of a vast research program to discover and develop new uses in industry for everyday products of the American farm.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I note what the distinguished Senator from Indiana has had to say about the figure of $20 an acre. I am sure the Senator will agree with me that there has been much criticism all over the country of what is known as the soil bank program.

In connection with the figure of $20 an acre, I assume that what the Senator contemplates would be done, if this measure were passed, would be that the acreage which goes into that kind of program, at that figure or some other commensurate figure, would be acreage actually devoted to the production of the crops which are under the support programs today. I mean by that, not the marginal land, not the poorest land, but land actually devoted to the production of crops. The operation of the law would have to be policed or administered to the point where only the land with the best production, or average good production, would be taken out of production.

Mr. CAPEHART. The able Senator from Kansas is 100 percent correct. However, the figure is $25 and not $20.

The weakness of the present conservation program is that it takes out of production marginal acres, grass lands, and pasture, and not necessarily acres which have been producing corn, wheat, sorghum grains, cotton, and the other commodities which go to make up the surplus which is so troublesome.

Under this proposal no land could be put in the storage reserve except acres which, during 3 of the past 5 years, were producing corn, cotton, wheat, soybeans, and other commodities the prices of which we are supporting, which support is costing the taxpayers money. If we take such acres out of production, we can accomplish something. We do not accomplish anything in particular, so far as conservation is concerned, if we take out of production grass land, hay land, or marginal land. That has been the weakness of the present system. It has not taken out of production land which was contributing to the surplus. Under my proposal only land which was contributing to the surplus would be taken out of production.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I agree thoroughly with what the Senator has to say about the type of land which should be taken out of production. I appreciate the opportunity which I have had of discussing with the distinguished Senator from Indiana his approach to the overall problem. I realize, as he does, that something must be done. We must wrestle with the program.

Let me point out to the Senator something of which I know he is aware, but which I should like to have in the RECORD. In my section of the country, Kansas, especially in the western portion of my State, and in areas such as eastern Colorado, the Dakotas, and a number of other States, there is in operation what is known as the summer fallow program. The land is put into production every other year, after it has been cultivated; and thus the moisture is stored.

The distinguished Senator from Indiana points out the provision taking into consideration the average of 3 of the past 5 years. Some relationship would have to be worked out, so that those in the agricultural sections of the country who are following the summer fallowing practice would be protected.

Mr. CAPEHART. The Senator is correct.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I assume the Senator has made provision for such protection?

Mr. CAPEHART. I believe that taking into consideration the average of 3 of the past 5 years would accomplish that purpose. If it would not, some other figure could be used. I agree with the Senator that such a situation should be covered.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I was happy to cosponsor with the Senator his agricultural bill, which, as was pointed out by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] a few moments ago, dealt with the research phase of agricultural production, and industrial uses of agricultural products which might be affected as the result of various and sundry approaches. I am glad to note that the Senator is including that feature in his bill, notwithstanding the fact that only yesterday or the day before there was reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry a research or industrial-use bill. I think that is identical to the bill which the Senator from Indiana and many others of us cosponsored last year.

Mr. CAPEHART. That is correct. I cover that subject a little later in my statement.

It will be remembered that 3 or 4 years ago the Senate passed a measure directing the President to establish a commission to study the problem. The President did so. The Commission reported back to the Congress. As a result of that report legislation was introduced by many of us. The Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry reported a bill last year and the Senate passed the bill by a vote of 82 to 0. My present proposal is exactly the same as that contained in the bill which we passed last year. The bill was the result of the contribution which many of us made, including the able Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] and the able Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL].

The third point of the program is—

Freeze the Government's stockpile of commodities, sometimes more commonly referred to as surplus, except for sales made under Public Law 480, exports, the school lunch program, distribution to the needy throughout the United States and the world, and other exceptions covered by the present law. However, the most important part of the freeze is denying the Government the right to sell in the domestic market at a price less than 100 percent of parity and then only after a finding by the President that an emergency exists or that hardships may result because of a shortage of any given commodity in the stockpile.

This is what one will discover if he will analyze existing laws and the regulations promulgated by the Department of Agriculture:

Mr. Benson, the Secretary of Agriculture, has what he calls a flexible price support system, under which he has been reducing price supports. Yet we have a law which says to the Secretary of Agriculture that he may not sell in the domestic market any of the $9 billion worth of commodities which we have on hand, except at 5 percent above the support price—not 5 percent above parity, not 5 percent above 90 percent of parity, as many people advocate, but 5 percent above the existing support price, which means that the lower the Secretary places the support prices, when he gets ready to sell from the stockpile he can sell only at 5 percent above the support prices.

At the moment wheat is being supported at 75 percent of parity. Therefore the Secretary can sell from the stockpile at 80 percent of parity, plus a small handling charge.

I wish every Senator were present in the Chamber today, and I wish everyone in the United States could understand and be as firmly convinced as I am, that the policy of setting a ceiling on the sale at 5 percent above the support prices is tantamount to establishing the farmer's market price. Let us see if I am not correct.

For example, today the Government has 753 million bushels of wheat in stock, meaning that it owns that many bushels. It has physical possession of the wheat.

There are loans outstanding on another 533 million bushels. If the market price is lower than the support price, when the time comes for the farmers to deliver the grain, the Government will receive the grain and put it into the stockpile. If it receives all of it—which possibly may not happen—the Government will own about 1,300 million bushels of wheat. There are only 1,600 million bushels of wheat in the United States. That is what we call the visible supply. That is all there is. The Government owns or controls 1,300 million bushels of it. Of that amount, 300 million bushels are in the hands of private enterprises—the flour mills, the food mills, and also on the farms. Therefore, the visible supply which the Government does not control directly is about 300 million bushels. Therefore, if something happened to the billion bushels of wheat, leaving only 300 million bushels of wheat in the United States, wheat would go up in price.

However, the Government owns 1,300 million bushels of wheat, and there is a law on the books which provides that it must be sold at 5 percent above the existing support price. Therefore, why should a private enterpriser pay any more than 5 percent above 75 percent of parity? He knows where it is and he can get it at any time he wants to get it. There is no particular reason why he should buy it. In many instances the Government is paying the private enterprisers to store the wheat, corn, and other products, in their elevators, paying them 1 cent a bushel per month for corn, plus 7 cents a bushel to move it in and out. That amounts to 19 cents a bushel for the first year. The wheat is stored with the private enterprisers.

The law provides that anyone can buy the wheat at any time he wishes to do so at 5 percent above the support price. In the case of wheat, that is 80 percent of parity at this time.

I am thoroughly convinced that that has a tendency to hold the price down. Under the proposed legislation I have introduced today it is provided that wheat and the other commodities may not be sold for less than 100 percent of parity, except when there is an emergency, and the President makes a finding to that effect.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I wish to join in commending the able Senator from Indiana for addressing himself to this very important problem. The remarks which he has made with respect to the market price of the visible supply point up to me the importance of the suggestion I made in my bill, S. 946, which provides that when land is taken out of production the rent on the land is to be paid with the commodities on hand, instead of with dollars. It also points up the fact that in order to induce farmers to take a commodity they must be given a 10-percent bonus. It is my feeling that, with the finding of new uses and the elimination of certain acres from production, it is necessary to do something to get rid of the stock on hand. So long as we have that visible supply, it will have a depressing effect on the market. I believe that a large part of that stock could be used to pay the rental charges for the land taken out of production. In that way we could work on the problem from both ends; we could stop new production and we could reduce the surplus stock. Then we could get off on an even keel.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, what I have said about wheat applies also to corn, soybeans, and to any other crop in the stockpile, because the law provides that they cannot be sold except at 5 percent above the existing support price. That is what we must keep in mind—it is the existing support price which is involved. It is my position that that law is keeping farm prices down. If we do not do anything else, we should change the law which prevents sales from the stockpile at less than 100 percent of parity. We have already adopted the principle, because we have provided that these commodities must be sold at 5 percent above the existing support prices. That provision has the tendency to set the market price.

Now, let us take these one by one, examine the reasoning behind each, and suggest the details of their operation.

ACREAGE STORAGE PLAN

To be eligible for inclusion in the acreage storage plan at $25 an acre, it would be required that land must have been planted for at least 3 of the last 5 years in wheat, corn, cotton, soybeans, oats, barley, rye, sorghum grains, rice, peanuts, tobacco, or clover, these, with the exception of clover, being the commodities under existing law that are covered by price supports.

These contracts would run for a period of 5 years.

Such a program has an obvious purpose of taking out of production enough land to reduce the costly overproduction which we all agree is the basic problem at the moment. The ultimate purpose, of course, would be to bring the production more nearly in line with the demand, thereby increasing farm prices through the law of supply and demand and eliminating the necessity for our costly price support program. The total of the tillable land in the United States growing the above-mentioned price support crops, except clover, was approximately 240 million acres last year.

There are more tillable acres than that, because there are grass lands, hay lands, and so forth. However I am talking about the acres on which are grown the commodities we are supporting with price supports.

Therefore, one can readily see that my proposal would eliminate from production only acres which have been producing commodities that have proven to be the most troublesome as far as overproduction is concerned and the commodities that are in the Government's stockpile or surplus pile at the moment.

This program eliminates the possibility of any farmer renting to the Government land, grass land, timber land or hay land. In other words, the sole purpose of this bill is to reduce the production of those crops or commodities which have been contributing to our costly program.

Now, frankly, on a long-range basis I do not like this kind of plan because I believe the only ultimate solution of our problem is the eventual cultivation of every tillable acre of land on every farm in the United States.

Frankly, at the moment this is not possible because to do so would only add to the more than $9 billion of surplus which now hangs over the farm market and costs the taxpayers a billion dollars a year for interest and storage alone.

INDUSTRIAL USES THE REAL ANSWER

That brings me to the section of the bill which calls for new uses for farm products.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. Would the program the Senator suggests, for a storage reserve, be an optional program for farmers, or would it be a compulsory program?

Mr. CAPEHART. It would be an optional program.

Mr. COOPER. As the Senator knows, the major commodity in my State is tobacco. For the past 3 years the production of burley tobacco in the United States has been actually less than the consumption. It would be assumed that with respect to commodities the consumption of which exceeds the production, there would not be the same necessity for the withdrawal of acreage as there would be with respect to other crops. However, the other part of the Senator's program, with respect to what to do with the surpluses which are now held by the Government, would, of course, be applicable to any commodity which was in surplus so far as storage was concerned, as I understand.

Mr. CAPEHART. The Senator is correct. The purpose of it is to take out of production acres on which are grown the crops which are contributing to the surpluses, and which are supported by Government price supports. That practice is costing the taxpayers a great deal of money. At the same time, in my opinion, it is depressing the farmers' prices. Of course, if there is no overproduction of tobacco, then the market price is up to a satisfactory point.

Much as I dislike basically the program to reduce production, I see it as the only answer until the Congress and the administraiton wake up to the realization that the ultimate answer to the farm problem is a vast research program to discover and develop new uses in industry of the everyday products of the American farm.

Many Members of Congress, including myself, have been for many years trying to get started what we called a crash program in finding new uses for farm products in industry and new markets.

I introduced such a bill on March 21, 1956, and again on January 17, 1957, as well as having introduced it earlier in this session on February 19, 1959. Many other Senators and Congressmen have similar bills to accomplish the same purpose.

I said before that my proposal is exactly the same as the resolution adopted by the Senate last year, calling upon the President to appoint a commission to study the question of finding new uses for farm products in industry and new markets. This Commission made its report on April 17, 1957.

The Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, using this report as a yardstick, together with the bills introduced by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON] and by me, in each case with cosponsors, reported a bill favorably to the Senate on July 2, 1958. This bill passed the Senate on July 29, 1958, by a vote of 82 to 0. It died in the House due to early adjournment after it arrived there. Therefore, in this bill, title III, on finding new uses for farm products in industry and new markets, is an exact copy, word for word, of the bill passed by the Senate at the last session by a unanimous vote. Since there was no controversy in the Senate over that bill, the exact language of it has been included in this new proposal.

It is my best judgment that if we in Congress will face up to its responsibility and pass such a measure, the effect within a relatively short time will be to create such a terrific new demand for farm products that the country can completely do away with the costly measures by which production is now controlled and huge surpluses are piled up.

Properly conceived and dramatized, such a program would, in my opinion, make it possible to begin to reduce the amount of land which agricultural economics now dictate must be taken out of production.

I have said in the Senate many times, and I repeat it now: The only real and final answer to the farm problem is the discovery and development of new markets and new industrial uses for the production of American farms.

Industry spends billions for research to develop new products. Industry has in fact developed a great many products which have robbed the American farm of some of its markets.

But the American farmer has nobody to do this for him. It thus becomes an obligation of the Government.

I shall not speak any further about the portion of the bill relating to industrial uses of agricultural products, because I understand that in the last few days the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry unanimously reported to the Senate a bill covering that feature of my bill, or my suggestion.

FREEZING THE SURPLUS

Another vital section of the bill provides for the freezing of the surplus. Freezing the surplus means to take it completely off the market except by the methods under which it may be disposed of by the Department of Agriculture under certain conditions and to certain organizations and groups, among them being Public Law 480, exports, the school lunch program, and other means described in the bill and described heretofore.

I understand that two bills have been introduced in the Senate in the last few days, one relating to food for peace, the other to a food stamp plan. If the Senate should pass those two bills, they likewise would provide exceptions to the stockpiling of commodities. But the surplus would be frozen for all practical purposes. It would not be sold in the domestic market except at 100 percent of parity.

One other method of disposing of commodities in the surplus under the bill is for the President, if he finds that there is a real shortage of any commodity which is unduly raising the price or creating a hardship, to direct the Secretary of Agriculture to sell any commodity at 100 percent parity. Parity in this instance means the parity established by the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938.

Those who have studied this problem are convinced, as I am, that the effect on farm prices of applying the simple surplus freeze method would be considerable. Farm prices certainly would rise as a result. They could not help doing so. If the support price were at 100 percent or 90 percent of parity, that would be one thing. But the lower the support prices are made under existing law, since sales must be made at 5 percent above the support price, the lower the prices in the free market will be. They cannot help being lower. That is 100 percent true, so long as there is a surplus.

The purpose of lowering support prices is to save the taxpayers' money, on the basis that if the Government is to buy the surplus, it will cost the taxpayers less to buy it at 75 percent of parity than at 80 percent or 90 percent of parity. But to date the support prices have failed, because surpluses, instead of becoming smaller, have been growing larger, while the free market price is getting very little, if any, higher. It may be higher on some items, but on others it is not.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. As a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I have studied these matters to some extent, because day after day we hold hearings on agricultural subjects.

I agree with the Senator from Indiana that something must be done to raise the parity price and to provide strict controls. Some persons would have low parity prices and would almost turn production loose. I can see how the plan which the Senator from Indiana is proposing might serve a very good purpose, so far as it concerns the amount of the surplus which is used in the United States.

Mr. CAPEHART. My bill freezes the surplus and provides that it can be sold in the free market in the United States only at 100 percent of parity.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. That is correct. In other words, whatever is used in the United States is subject to 100 percent of parity.

Mr. CAPEHART. If it were sold from the stockpile.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I also agree with the Senator's statement that when the parity price is made higher, the price which the farmer receives also will be higher.

Mr. CAPEHART. That is correct. That is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. We must all admit that farmers are in a very precarious economic condition at present, and we all realize that Congress must do something to protect them.

I think the Senator from Indiana will agree with me that it is necessary also to find other uses for agricultural products than obtained at present. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has reported a bill which I introduced looking to an investigation into this subject. I think the Senator from Indiana introduced a somewhat similar bill in the past. The enactment of such bills would do much good. It is imperative that more uses for agricultural products be found in order to dispose of the surpluses. If a small amount of money is spent to conduct such an investigation, other uses for agricultural products will be found, and thereby the surpluses will be reduced.

The Senator from Indiana and I may be working from different angles, but we are seeking to achieve the same end. I am sure our efforts will do much toward reducing agricultural surpluses, will increase the price level of farm products, and will ease the farmer's high cost of living. I believe that the entire United States will benefit if something is done along these lines.

Mr. CAPEHART. I thank the able Senator from South Carolina for his constructive contribution to the discussion.

Mr. President, let me list what we now have in surplus and under loan: Cotton, 8 million bales; wheat, 1,300 million bushels; corn, 1,500 million bushels; tobacco, 924 million pounds; grain sorghum, 200 million hundredweight; barley, 69 million bushels; rice, 6 million hundredweight; soybeans, 12 million bushels; butter, 44½ million pounds; rosin, 262 million pounds; oats, 25 million bushels; dried milk, 116½ million pounds.

Under the present law, the Secretary of Agriculture may dispose of surpluses at 5 percent above the existing support price of a given commodity. For example, the support price at the moment on wheat is 75 percent. This means that under existing law, rules, and regulations, wheat can be sold by the Commodity Credit Corporation at 80 percent of parity, plus a small handling charge. This, in my opinion, removes the incentive for a prospective buyer to go into the market to purchase the commodity, because he knows that anytime he wants it he can get all he wants from the Government for only 5 percent above the existing support prices, which I believe we will all agree are low at the moment.

This arrangement, in my opinion, creates a situation under which the support price certainly influences, if not altogether controls, the market price. I believe Senators will agree with me that this is wrong. Obviously it would have the effect of increasing the farmers' prices. Let me cite an example. The existing visible supply of wheat in the United States is about 1,500 million bushels. Of this amount, the Government has in storage or under loan about 1,286 million bushels. That means that there is available for the market from other than Government sources only 254 million bushels, about a 5 months' supply.

Senators can imagine what the price of wheat would be if there were actually avaliable only 254 million bushels. Here is a concrete example of the depressing effect suffered by the farmer from the overhanging available surplus.

In fixing the support price for wheat, the Secretary of Agriculture is now required by law to take into consideration the wheat held in Government surplus storage or under loan.

Mr. President, farm prices are too low. The farmer receives less than 4 cents out of every dollar of the national income, while the wage earner receives 71 cents.

The history of support prices is that they fix the market price, usually at a lower range. Manifestly this is so, otherwise there would be no commodities in surplus. Low support prices keep the farmer's price down, and he is forced to sell to the Government.

Since 1933 the cost of trying to stabilize farm prices has been $30 billion, $15 billion of which has been spent in the last 6 years, and $15 billion in the preceding years.

CORN

We leave the corn law as it is. Corn growers voted against any acreage controls. They are now guaranteed a support price of $1.12, regardless of the amount of corn they grow.

Corn growers will be permitted to come in under the acreage storage, but otherwise they will operate under the same system in vogue now. Mr. President, there are about 4,800,000 farms in the Nation. This, however, does not portray their full economic reach. On the prosperity of the farm depends the entire rural and semiurban community surrounding it. The stores of our small cities, the railroads, the trucks, the farm implement and fertilizer people, those who sell goods to the farmer—all of them depend upon the prosperity of the farms. There is no end to our farm economy. It pervades all segments of our life. It is basic to the livelihood of all of us.

I have made the statement that the corn law will be allowed to remain as it is. The reason is that there is no possibility of changing it this year. The Government has a contract with the farmers. The farmers voted in a referendum to have the Government take action which is being taken; namely, that there will be no acreage controls, while corn will be supported—at least in my State—at $1.12 a bushel.

Mr. President, such a program as I have proposed, or any other good farm program, should accomplish these things:

First. Eventually get the Government and taxpayers completely out of the farming business.

Second. Permit, after a short time, farmers to run their farms as they think best.

Third. Reduce the cost during the year 1960 very materially, and thereafter substantially because there should be no necessity for placing any commodity in Government warehouses.

Fourth. Increase the farmers' prices in the free market to the parity concept.

I believe the bill will go a long way toward accomplishing these purposes. The Nation has a farm problem which is troublesome not only to the taxpayers, but also to the farmers. The problem will not solve itself; Congress will have to solve it. I think there will be an uprising on the part of the taxpayers in general and the farmers in particular if Congress does not solve it, and if the cost of living generally rises, while prices for farm products stay where they are or go lower.

I call attention again to the statement I made earlier, namely, that the Department of Agriculture is spending for all purposes—not exclusively for price supports—about $6,500 million; yet the net income of all the American farmers is only a little more than $13 billion. So the matter is serious.

I think it is more serious than many of the other problems we are considering and working on. As I have already stated, I believe it is much more serious than the visit of Mr. Castro or many of the other matters which we consider and work on and check on at great length.

Talk about balancing the budget. Talk about inflation. Here we find that only one department of the Government is spending $6,500 million a year, and since 1933 that Department has spent $30 billion, and in the past 6 years that one department of our Government has spent $15 billion.

If we wish to reduce taxes and if we wish to balance the budget, let us get down to the business of writing good, sane, sound farm legislation which will do this job properly.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from Indiana yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BYRD of West Virginia in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CAPEHART. I am glad to yield.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I have had an opportunity to talk several times to the distinguished Senator from Indiana about this subject. I have studied his bill, and also read the prepared text of his remarks.

Although any legislation on this subject is bound to raise certain questions, I believe that certain of the things he has said need to be emphasized.

The first is of course that the cost of the present program is not alone a cost to the United States Government. Certainly it is ridiculous for the Government to engage in, and to continue, a program which costs half as much as the total income of all those who are participating in the industry which is affected. In other words, the Government is spending approximately $6,500 million annually, through the Department of Agriculture, whereas we can expect, at best, that the farmers of the Nation will have a net annual income of approximately $13 billion.

I have long contended, and I still believe implicitly, that we need to get the farm economy back into the hands of the farmers. One of the steps which might be taken in that connection is, of course, to make increased use of marketing cooperatives.

However, in this case nothing is truer than the fact that we shall never have fair farm legislation so long as we have legislation which is based upon the so-called six basic commodities. That plan has never proven itself, and it never will.

I think the Senator from Indiana has made a very great contribution, in showing that under the practice of our Government—not only under rigid supports, but also under flexible supports—when the Government makes loans on a farm commodity, in the event the price of the commodity does not exceed parity or the percentage of parity which has been fixed, the Government takes over the commodity, and puts it into warehouses, and then can sell it at 105 percent, not of parity, but of the support price. With our right hand we are trying to raise the prices of farm commodities, while with our left hand we have built in an absolute barrier to the raising of the price of a single farm commodity.

Mr. President, the contribution of the Senator from Indiana in this respect—and I refer to his earnest endeavor to get us to realize how fallacious and how screwball such a plan is—is worth all the labor and all the effort he has devoted to it.

I also realize, if the Senator from Indiana will indulge me further—that unless the Congress faces up to its responsibility in this connection and takes some action in regard to a farm program, the weight of the farm program itself will defeat it; and when the well-being of all the farmers of the Nation—and the farm population amounts to 13 million—is destroyed, the result will be to tear down and destroy one of the greatest supports of the heavy industries of the Nation. Certainly we cannot afford to allow the agricultural economy to go down the drain. But, by the same token, we cannot permit another year to pass without doing something about the farm program.

There may be those who say that the program my colleague proposes is audacious. Certainly there are parts of it about which I have reservations. But the Congress this year must do something audacious and something courageous about this problem because anything the Congress does this year cannot be effective until next year. Otherwise, the farm economy of the country will collapse, and will leave 13 million people stranded economically on the fields and the streets—not to mention the millions of small towns which are dependent upon the agricultural economy. Of this I am sure; and I pay my tribute to the Senator from Indiana for the great work he has done on this problem.

Regardless of whether the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry adopts the program the Senator from Indiana is proposing, certainly that committee should adopt some program of this sort or should make a realistic approach to such a program, because we can no longer afford to fiddle with the welfare of so many million Americans.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I thank the able Senator from Colorado for his most constructive contribution.

I wish to say that the sale of farm commodities at 5 percent above existing support prices is required by law, which the Secretary of Agriculture cannot change; neither can the President change it. Only the Congress can change the law.

When I talk to people about the farm problem, I am amazed to find that so many of them have an idea that the problem is solving itself.

Mr. President, in the course of my remarks today, I have been careful not to indulge in criticism of anyone. I have not criticized either the Democratic Party or the Republican Party; I have entirely avoided personalities. I have consistently endeavored to be factual.

However, Mr. President, I wish to say that as a result of speeches the Secretary of Agriculture makes and as a result of a lack of action on the part of the Congress, many persons have the idea that the farm situation is getting better, whereas the facts show that just the opposite is the case. Actually, the situation is getting worse, rather than better.

When those who live in the cities say to me, "This whole business is being solved now by the low support prices and similar things," I do not think they realize that the present program is costing billions and billions of dollars—in fact, much more than it has ever cost before. I do not think they realize that the stockpile of agricultural commodities is constantly enlarging; and neither do I think they realize that the Department of Agriculture, through the appropriations made by the Congress—for the Department cannot spend money unless the Congress first appropriates it—is today spending half as much as the total net income of all American farmers.

It seems to me that too many persons are sticking their heads into the sand, and are not being realistic about this matter.

However, Mr. President, in the final analysis the responsibility is that of the Congress.

On the other hand, in this connection I am not excusing the administration, I believe the administration also should be giving us suggestions about how to solve the problem, and should be asking Congress to do certain things in that connection, because the administration has all the facts and all the figures, and knows in what direction the farm situation is developing. It has this responsibility. The Congress also has a responsibility. All I am trying to do today, and all I am trying to do by introducing this bill, is to obtain some action, and to induce the Congress, if it will, to use my bill, or some other bill—I care not which—as a starting point for getting action. If we do not do so, I think we shall be severely criticized, and rightly so, in years to come.

In closing, I wish to say unless we take some appropriate action the amount of surplus commodities will increase to $10, $11, $12, $13, or $14 billion. The net income of the American farmers is possibly going to become less. It is getting no better. The only thing which might save the farmers would be a severe drought. For the failure to solve the problem, what a penalty would be imposed by severe drought which would prevent farmers from growing crops for 1, 2, or 3 years, and deprive them of any income. That could solve the problem, but I do not think it is going to happen.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CAPEHART. I yield.

Mr. DWORSHAK. I believe the senior Senator from Indiana has rendered outstanding service in calling to the attention of the Senate the importance of wholesale cooperation in assailing some of the problems confronting agriculture today. Does not the Senator deplore the tendency of the involvement of agricultural problems in partisanship and efforts to make a political football out of them, instead of trying to solve the problems so we can stabilize the situation?

Mr. CAPEHART. Yes. Agricultural problems have affected the national economy to the point where no one ought to play politics with them.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Does the Senator believe there has been some effort along that line?

Mr. CAPEHART. Yes, I am afraid there has been; and I feel it ought not to be done, because the problem is too serious, from the standpoint alone of the taxpayers, aside from that of the farmers, because their income is so low. The problem is very serious from the standpoint of the cost to the taxpayer, as well as from the standpoint of the farmer, whose prices are too low.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Does the Senator from Indiana agree that by pursuing the political aspects of this controversy, there is ever present the possibility that we may be undermining agriculture, with devastating effect on our general economy? That would be a real tragedy to our country, would it not?

Mr. CAPEHART. There can be no question that it would be a real tragedy.

I should like to emphasize one other point. The farmers are not to blame. Many persons say, "You are subsidizing the farmer," as if the farmer was getting rich as a result of the farm program. The total net income of farmers is below $13 billion. The farmer does not like to be placed under a Federal program. He would much prefer to have the Government get completely out of the farming business and that he be permitted to run his farm as he sees fit, and sell his products in the open market at a price which would be profitable to him. Congress ought to devise a program which looks to that end. The way the situation is now, just the opposite is true. For example, only today I had a man say to me, "The best thing you can do is repeal all the farm laws." I would agree with him provided something could be done with the surplus stockpile of $9 billion. The Government has contracts with farmers which will run throughout this calendar year. Those contracts cannot be repealed. The earliest we could legislate in that regard would be in the early part of the next year. All the farm laws could be repealed and the Government would not have to enter into any contracts with the farmers. But contracts are in existence for the remainder of 1959, and there is in existence a stockpile of $9 billion worth of surplus commodities. What is to be done with them?

Mr. DWORSHAK. Does the Senator from Indiana believe that, while there is a tendency of farmers to hold the Republican executive branch responsible for the failure to solve some of these problems, at the same time farmers, through their national organizations, are holding the legislative branch equally responsible and accountable for the failure to meet this serious challenge?

Mr. CAPEHART. There can be no question that the solution of the problems is the responsibility of the Congress. Only the Congress can change the law. Let us consider what I think is the worst situation of all. There is a law which provides that farm commodities in the stockpile can be sold only at 5 percent above the existing support price. That is the law, and it ought to be changed. In fact, my honest belief is the Senate ought to quickly adopt a resolution on Monday, when it next convenes, changing that section of the law, so the change could be put into effect immediately. I think if the law were changed, it would immediately raise farmers' prices.

Do we realize what it would mean to the American taxpayers if the market price of corn, wheat, cotton, and other commodities was above the support price? Let me show how much money it would save the taxpayers if the market price were higher than the support price, so that farmers would not be delivering their commodities to the Commodity Credit Corporation. I am about to give the amounts and the names of commodities from the list of commodities on which the Government has issued loans, and as to which the Government has said to the farmer, "If, when your loan comes due, the market price is lower than the support price, you can deliver the commodities to us and we will pay your loan off."

Let me give a little idea of how the bill introduced today will save the American taxpayers money in the next few months, and how much money it will save them, if the bill will do the things we believe it can and will do.

In the case of cotton there are under loan 6,447,558 bales of upland cotton, at a total cost of $1,101 million-plus.

There are 533 million-plus bushels of wheat on loan, at a cost of $978 million-plus.

There are on loan 924 million-plus pounds of tobacco, at a cost of $599 million-plus.

There are 427 million-plus bushels of corn on loan, at a cost of $523 million-plus.

There are 146 million-plus hundredweight of grain sorghums on loan, at a cost of $276 million-plus.

With respect to other commodities, which I shall not name individually, there are loans of $497 million-plus.

The total amount of the loans is $3,977,848,262—a little less than $4 billion.

If the market prices farmers received were to go above the level of the support prices, and the farmers sold their products in the free market at prices above the support prices, the taxpayers would have nearly $4 billion of their money saved.

That is what the cost will amount to if the farmers deliver the commodities I have mentioned. They may not; but they have the right to do so. If only the great majority of them delivered those commodities, and if the market price was lower than the support price, that is the amount which would be involved. So, Mr. and Mrs. Taxpayer, you get an idea what it would mean to you if we could find a way to keep the market price above the support price, and if we could eliminate the roadblocks which have a tendency to pull down market prices.

Mr. President, this is a matter in which city people ought to be as much interested as farmers.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the U.S. Department of Agriculture bulletin issued on April 1, 1959, entitled "Status of the CCC Price Support Programs as of February 28," which gives all the figures I have been reading into the RECORD on numerous occasions.

There being no objection, the bulletin was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATUS OF CCC PRICE-SUPPORT PROGRAMS AS OF FEBRUARY 28

The U.S. Department of Agriculture reported today that as of February 28, investment of the Commodity Credit Corporation in price-support programs amounted to $9,089,475,000—made up of loans outstanding of $3,977,848,000 (including $706,779,450 of loans financed by lending agencies), and the cost value of inventories $5,111,627,000.

As of February 28, 1958, the investment was $7,317,819,000, of which loans outstanding amounted to $2,427,782,000 and inventories $4,890,037,000.

Price-support operations in five commodities accounted for the bulk of the February 28, 1959, loan total, as follows:

Cotton, upland, 6,447,558 bales	$1,101,695,551
Wheat, 533,444,796 bushels	978,879,790
Tobacco, 924,451,817 pounds	599,437,828
Corn, 427,271,926 bushels	523,818,948
Grain sorghum, 146,188,894 hundredweight	276,081,784
Other	497,934,361
Total	3,977,848,262

(Included under "other" were loans on extra long staple cotton, cottonseed, barley, dry edible beans, flaxseed, oats, rice, rye, soybeans, honey, peanuts, and tung oil, the largest being $249,699,676 on soybeans.)

Major items in the inventory of CCC as of February 28 were:

Wheat, 753,509,376 bushels	$2,144,139,573
Corn, 1,144,121,938 bushels	2,014,653,082
Grain sorghum, 156,295,221 hundredweight	410,507,557
Cotton, upland, 1,411,576 bales	205,573,504
Barley, 69,340,032 bushels	84,175,653
Rice, rough and milled, 6,268,394 hundredweight	54,366,420
Strategic materials	36,503,561
Soybeans, 12,152,353 bushels	28,286,736
Butter, 44,408,334 pounds	26,331,946
Rosin, 262,185,642 pounds	20,797,740
Oats, 25,394,135 bushels	19,491,597
Dried milk, 116,467,411 pounds	18,000,609
Cotton, extra long staple, 32,307 bales	9,461,956
Other	39,336,835
Total	5,111,626,769

(Other items in inventory include cheese, dry edible beans, cornmeal, flaxseed, rye, wheat flour, gum turpentine, tobacco, crude cottonseed oil, refined cottonseed oil, peanuts, and tung oil, the largest of which was tobacco, with a cost value of $7,643,455.)

Net realized program loss on price-support operations for the 8 months ended February 28, 1959, totaled $491,848,510. For the same period last year the comparable loss was $712,922,765, and for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1958, the program loss on price-support operations totaled $1,006,548,967.

Price-support operations of CCC are financed in large part, though not completely, by borrowings. CCC is authorized by statute to borrow money as needed, but as of February 28 total borrowings could not at any time exceed in the aggregate $14.5 billion.

CCC reserves a sufficient amount of this borrowing authority to purchase at any time all loans and other obligations held by lending agencies under the Corporation's programs. As of February 28, CCC had in use $13,940,832,000 of this authority; actual borrowings amounted to $13,233 million, and obligations to purchase loans financed by lending agencies amounted to $707,832,000. This left a statutory borrowing authority of $559,168,000.

Loans and inventory figures covered in this release do not include purchase agreements which provide for purchase by CCC of stipulated quantities of price-support commodities if offered by producers at the end of the loan period. These purchase agreements entered into on 1958 crops through February 28, 1959, had an estimated total value of $190,989,000. Purchase agreements entered into on 1957 crops through February 28, 1958, had an estimated total value of $196,363,000.

Price support extended (total loans made plus direct purchases plus purchase agreements entered into) on 1958 crops alone through February 28, 1959, amounted to $3,$774,812,633, compared with $2,285,399,931 on 1957 crops through February 28, 1958.

MOVEMENT INTO AND OUT OF CCC'S PRICE-SUPPORT INVENTORY

Commodities purchased or otherwise acquired by CCC in February had a cost value of $46,683,571, bringing the total for the first 8 months of the 1959 fiscal year to $924,578,797. For the same 8 months' period a year earlier purchases and acquisitions amounted to $1,585,303,427.

Movement of commodities out of CCC's inventories in February totaled $194,754,936 cost value basis, making a fiscal year 1959 total through February of $1,679,469,171. The out-movement in the first 8 months of fiscal year 1958 totaled $2,491,786,929.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1555) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with request to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes.

Mr. HUMPHREY obtained the floor.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARTLETT in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield to the Senator from Colorado, provided I do not lose my right to the floor, and I ask unanimous consent that I may do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Minnesota? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I express my appreciation to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. President, my fear that the American public will not comprehend the action we are taking in the matter of labor legislation has mounted day by day, amendment by amendment. The committee bill is 59 pages long and already some 100 amendments are contemplated. I feel sure that there are those among us, despite our prolonged attention to this subject, who do not completely understand every facet of its complicated nature.

Mr. President, it is time the American people understand what we are trying to do in the labor field. They know of the horrors and the filth uncovered by investigation, but they are completely at sea when this jungle of words is thrust before them.

My own views on labor legislation are well known—the Kennedy bill does not go to the real roots of the problem. It seems quite possible that we will so become involved in semantics and minute points of law we will lose sight of the forest for the trees.

Mr. President, we owe a compact, workable measure to the millions of honest, sincere union members who want help, guidance, and clarification of labor legislation. And I fully realize that some of the points in the bill, and many of the proposed amendments, are designed to provide just that.

However, if this debate does reach a stage of complete confusion and bewilderment to the public, I am considering offering as an amendment a very simple, substitute bill. I acknowledge that under normal procedure, such a substitute should be presented first to the hard-working Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. Yet, this subject has been studied and restudied so much that no apologies would be needed.

Mr. President, every poll which I have seen indicates one paramount desire on the part of union members: They want to be able to run their own unions. They want an end to the plundering by that unscrupulous handful with whom we have become disgustingly familiar.

The honest backbone of the American labor force wants the tools with which they can accomplish this need. What is required is that we act simply, in understandable language and in the spirit of fair play:

First. Guarantee democratic operation of unions by requiring honest and secret balloting.

Second. Require responsibility to union members by those who handle their money by imposing the same duties and penalties upon them as upon any other person to whom money is entrusted.

Third. Provide protection for union members and the public against hoodlumism and strong-arm tactics through a clear and positive law against secondary boycotting and blackmail picketing.

Mr. President, I wish to say again that these three points will constitute a bill which I plan to offer in the event the debate of next week dissolves into "t" crossing and "i" dotting; into a debate which can produce only incomprehensible, ineffectual legislation. It is my intent that the public shall know what we are doing. But most of all, our intent must be understood clearly by those outlaw bums who, through their isolated tactics, have cast a shadow on the great American labor movement, and the millions of great Americans who are a part of it.

Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk for printing. I plan to call up the amendment next week.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be printed and will lie on the table.

Mr. ALLOTT. Mr. President, I express my appreciation to the distinguished Senator from Minnesota for his never-failing courtesy in yielding.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator. I am always happy to accommodate a friend.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from Minnesota yield to me?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the Senator from Nebraska without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Minnesota? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I offer, for printing, a series of amendments on behalf of my colleague, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], and two amendments on behalf of myself, to the pending bill, S. 1555.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendments will be received and printed and will lie on the table.

Mr. CURTIS. I thank the distinguished Senator from Minnesota.

GOVERNMENT EGG BUYING

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I am very happy today to invite attention to the fact that Secretary of Agriculture Benson finally has stepped up Government egg buying, using section 32 funds for a surplus removal program, as authorized by law.

As Senators know, I have been insisting since the 2d of April that the Secretary take action to lessen the severity of the break in egg prices. While a purchase program placed into action promptly upon notice of the break in egg prices would have been more effective, in this case the saying "better late than never" is certainly true. It is my sincere hope that this action will strengthen prices received by egg producers everywhere and stop the present sales at prices which are far below the cost of production.

I ask unanimous consent that the announcement of the USDA surplus disposal program be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the announcement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

USDA ANNOUNCES SURPLUS REMOVAL PROGRAM FOR EGGS; COMPLETE SCHOOL-LUNCH PURCHASES

USDA announced today its intentions to make weekly purchases of dried-egg solids with section 32 funds. This will be in addition to the approximate $14 million already spent in purchasing eggs for the school-lunch program. Egg prices have fallen to relatively low levels in recent weeks and the action announced today is being taken in an effort to stabilize and strengthen prices to producers.

At the same time, the Department announced the completion of a program of purchasing dried whole egg solids for use in the national school-lunch program. Funds for this program were transferred by Congress from section 32.

A total of 652,500 pounds was purchased this week, at a cost of $678,000. Total purchases for the program, which began on October 16, 1958, come to approximately 12 million pounds, and total expenditures of about $14 million. Prices paid this week ranged from $1.0278 to $1.0498 per pound, and offers were accepted from all seven bidders.

Most egg solids to be purchased under the section 32 surplus removal program will be distributed to needy persons, and the balance to welfare institutions. They will supplement the other foods now being donated by the Department and distributed by State agencies to needy people.

First offerings under the section 32 program will be due on April 22, at 1 p.m. and purchases will be made weekly thereafter. The quantities to be purchased weekly will depend upon offering prices in relation to prevailing producer prices. Continuation of the program will depend upon general market demands as reflected in producer prices in the weeks ahead.

Purchases in No. 10 tin cans will be limited to approximately 1 million pounds per month for distribution to institutions. The balance of purchases will be required to be packed in No. 2½ consumer size cans (13 ounces) for distribution to needy families.

The announcement of the new program will be mailed to the trade this week. Inquiries regarding the program should be sent to the Director, Poultry Division, Agricultural Marketing Service, U.S. Department of Agriculture, Washington 25, D.C.

Delivery under the awards that follow will be during the May 1 to May 16, 1959, period.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the sorry spectacle of the past few weeks points up a basic weakness in the poultry and egg industry of this country. Secretary Benson, as he speaks before various nonfarmer groups throughout the country, keeps repeating that agricultural commodities which have not been under mandatory price supports have not been in price trouble. Let me underscore the fact that there is no mandatory price-support program for poultry and eggs, and the producers are in real trouble.

A Government surplus-disposal program can bring temporary relief, but it cannot discharge the Government's full responsibility to this important agricultural industry.

The Senate Agriculture and Forestry Committee should undertake a full study of the poultry and egg industry to discover the causes for the evident economic imbalance and to explore possible corrective action.

To emphasize that this is no sudden, temporary price crisis for egg producers, I desire to read a telegram I received today from Dr. Irving Berger, acting president of the U.S. Poultry & Egg Producers Association:

MAYS LANDING, N.J.,
April 16, 1959.

Senator HUBERT HUMPHREY,
Washington, D.C.:

Thousands of families of poultry farmers are in economic jeopardy striving for their daily bread. The situation is so acute that their capital investment on which tens of thousands of people are depending for a living is being destroyed. Should they further swell the ranks of the unemployed? The commercial egg producer has contributed his energy and ingenuity to the national well-being of the consumer economy through the tremendous efficiencies developed since 1941 which are over 100 percent. If the egg production today would have followed the same pattern as it did up to 1940 it would have cost the consumer an additional million dollars to purchase a dozen eggs in the market. If agriculture would have kept pace with other phases of the economy there would have been a 20 percent increase in egg prices instead of a decrease of 20 percent. Egg prices have dropped to a low of 20 cents national average with the acknowledged national cost of production of 33 cents to 37 cents average resulting in the egg producer actually subsidizing the consumer to the extent of $60 million a month. He cannot further subsidize the consumer market at the cost of his own economic destruction. Without immediate alleviation of the situation it will cripple a sizable segment of our economy.

It behooves upon the Senate Agricultural Committee to rescue the commercial family egg producer. You are the heart and core of their survival.

Dr. IRVING BERGER,
Acting President, United States Poultry and Egg Producers Association, Inc.

Mr. President, I can say to Dr. Berger that we have finally been able to get some action. Three days ago I addressed the Senate with regard to this particular problem, placing in the RECORD my letter of April 2, my telegram, and my subsequent letter to the Secretary of Agriculture. I am pleased to note that, at long last, a response has come forth, and it is favorable.

The Secretary and the Department of Agriculture have acted. I may add that in the meantime in the State of Minnesota literally hundreds of thousands of dollars of cash income have been lost—money which would have been spent in the retail establishments and service institutions of our State. In a sense, the egg producer is the cash customer. The farmer with 100, 200, or 300 hens, who takes his eggs to market every day or every week, represents a sizable share of what we call cash income in agricultural production.

Let us hope that we shall not be faced with a situation like this again without some remedial action. I am happy to note that the announcement of the first purchase has already boosted the price for the producer. I said this would happen.

There are certain things which we know about agriculture. One of the things we know is that when the Department of Agriculture indicates its willingness to step in and firm up a market, the free market price of the commodity involved immediately reacts favorably. This has happened again.

It is regrettable that Congress must assume the responsibility of doing the job of administration. Our job should be that of legislation, and it should be the responsibility of the Department to utilize the law which we have given to the executive branch to effectuate policies laid down by the Congress.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Is it not also true that we find the same condition to exist in the administration of the laws placed on the statute books with regard to many other farm commodities? Practically the same situation existed in regard to the poultry industry before Christmas.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator is absolutely correct.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. We had to jack up the Department in order to get it to do something to save the poultry industry.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator is correct.

Quite frankly, the delay in Government purchases or Government orders with respect to perishable commodities not only costs the producers in Minnesota hundreds of thousands of dollars, and, on a national scale, millions of dollars of lost income; but it costs the Federal Treasury great losses. Folks simply do not have the money with which to pay taxes. They do not have the income upon which they could pay taxes.

Remember, Mr. President, the funds which are used are not taxpayers' funds. They are what we call tariff and import funds. They are funds which go into what are called section 32 funds, which represent collections made upon certain imports into this country—tariff funds which go into a special fund for the purchase of agricultural commodities.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Is it not also true that the Department cannot justly claim that it does not receive sufficient funds for investigation? We have given the Department many additional employees, and hundreds of thousands of dollars more with which to work.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator is absolutely correct. The number of employees has increased by from 20,000 to 25,000, and the amount of money available is rather substantial. It is so substantial that many of us hesitate even to mention it. It is well over $5 billion.

I thank the Senator from South Carolina, who has always championed the cause of the family farmer, and of economic justice for American agriculture. We are very fortunate that he serves on the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and not only takes an interest in the crops and production characteristic of his section of the country, but has a national vision, and exhibits an interest in and concern for the well being of our farm population in every State of the Union and every part of this great Nation.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I thank the Senator from Minnesota for his remarks concerning me.

A few days ago, when I had occasion to speak to representatives of the press, I made the statement concerning the Senator from Minnesota that if there were on the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry a few more Senators such as the Senator from Minnesota, we could put Mr. Benson in his place. I know that the farmers would be in far better condition than that in which they find themselves today.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the Senator. That is great praise from a fine and good man.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1555) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the bill pending before the Senate is S. 1555. It is known technically as the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959. It is known to the American public essentially as the Kennedy bill.

Mr. President, I wish to speak briefly on S. 1555, the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959, which is presently before the Senate.

I consider it an honor to be a cosponsor on this important measure, which is designed to eradicate the abuses which have come to light in the labor-management field. The bipartisan support which this bill received in the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare attests to the widespread conviction that this is a sound and fair proposal.

To the members of the committee who have worked so long and hard on this measure, we owe a vote of thanks. Few bills have received as thorough study and consideration as has S. 1555. At this time I wish to pay special tribute to the junior Senator from Massachusets [Mr. KENNEDY], as chief sponsor of the bill. For many, many months he has devoted his energies, time and talents to the development of a sound and practical bill. He has quite properly gained a reputation as being one of the foremost students of labor legislation in the Congress. This is a great honor and one which is richly deserved.

S. 1555 is a carefully considered measure to aid in the elimination of corrupt practices in the labor-management field while at the same time avoiding the danger of jeopardizing the effectiveness of the American trade-union movement in representing the working men and women of our land.

In reporting S. 1555, the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare emphasizes a very important point which should be kept in mind during this debate:

> The overwhelming majority (of unions) are honestly and democratically run. In providing remedies for existing evils the Senate should be careful neither to undermine self-government within the labor movement nor to weaken unions in their role as the bargaining representatives of employees.

In this connection, Mr. President, I should like to pay a tribute to the dedicated efforts of the leadership of the AFL–CIO to maintain the traditional high standards and principles of the American labor movement. The AFL–CIO has given more than mere lipservice. Its adoption of a rigid code of ethics and its ouster of those international unions which have betrayed their sacred trust took great courage.

The AFL–CIO has further demonstrated its sincere devotion to a dedicated labor movement by its endorsement and active support for the reform legislation presently before the Senate.

I might add that it is a rather unique situation when we see groups which are being regulated come before a Senate committee and, out of a sense of fairness and justice and dedication to the public interest, ask that legislation designed to regulate them be adopted. I do not recall any such development when holding companies were being regulated, when the stock market was being regulated, and when some of the great utilities were being regulated.

As the committee in its report also points out, in the instances of corruption which have been revealed, not only unions but also management has been involved. The hearings by the Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field under the able chairmanship of the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN] have uncovered numerous instances of employers having made payments to unethical union officials at the expense of their own employees. The so-called middlemen have also been used by certain employers as an undercover device to defeat legitimate union campaigns. Evidence has also come to light of employer payments to informers for the purpose of supplying information on union activities.

The Committee on Labor and Public Welfare in preparing S. 1555 has quite properly recognized the fact that the labor movement does not have a monopoly on original sin. To correct the unethical practices of certain employers the bill provides management reporting requirements and prohibits illicit payments by employers and by middlemen for the purpose of interfering with union organizing efforts and collective-bargaining agreements.

I have, quite frankly, been disappointed that organizations representing management have not shown greater concern over such unethical practices of certain employers—thank goodness only a few. I am also disappointed that management spokesmen have refused to support S. 1555 and have opposed provisions in the bill which seek to deal with management abuses.

It is my sincere hope that the Senate will approve S. 1555 and that it will soon be enacted. It would be, in my opinion, a tragedy if we did not take advantage of the present opportunity to enact reform legislation.

In fact, we have a political and moral obligation to do so. If we fail to act it will be a victory for those in the labor-management field who have betrayed American working people and the public at large for their own selfish advantage.

I know that there are those in the Congress who sincerely disagree with certain provisions of S. 1555, and there are those who feel that this bill does not go far enough. The important thing to keep in mind, however, is that S. 1555 does represent a meaningful long stride forward. In any meaningful legislation no one is ever completely satisfied. Yet the need for reform legislation is too great and important to permit its defeat due to the opposition of those who are not completely satisfied. I hope this will not prove to be the case.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am glad to yield to the distinguished Senator from Oregon.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I wish to say to the Senator from Minnesota that he is making a very able speech. I wish particularly to voice my concurrence with him when he points out that we should make a beginning in this very important field. I agree with him that S. 1555 is not a perfect bill. Nevertheless, it represents the viewpoint of numerous able and outstanding members of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare who have carefully studied the problem and who feel that the bill represents a good start in solving the problem.

It is interesting to note that there are many people who wish to begin with a perfect bill in this field. Yet I doubt that any proposed legislation was perfect when it started through Congress. If I am not mistaken, the Constitution of the United States, not long after its adoption, had to be amended 10 times in order to protect the basic liberties of the American people.

It is very easy for some persons to say, "Unless the proposed legislation is perfect, it should be voted down." I am always reminded of a story which was told in Oregon by one of the greatest Senators in the history of our State, the late Charles L. McNary, who for many years was the Republican leader of the Senate. When speaking about people who would never go along with anything unless every "i" were dotted and every

"t" were crossed precisely in a proposal, Senator McNary said it reminded him of some little children in a classroom. The teacher said, "All of you who want to go to heaven raise your hand." Every child in the class raised his hand except one little boy. The teacher looked at him, singled him out with her eyes, and said, "Johnny, don't you want to go to heaven?"

The little boy replied, "Yes, but not with that bunch of fellows," pointing to the rest of the class.

It is true that some sincere people single out every possible objection or omission with respect to proposed legislation. It seems to me that if we are to make a beginning in the field of protecting union democracy and safeguarding the funds of the working people who pay dues to a labor union, we will be able later to make such changes by way of amendments as may prove to be necessary. This can follow the tested method of trial and error.

I also wish to say to the distinguished senior Senator from Minnesota—and I believe he will agree with me—that there are some people who would like to see labor so straitjacketed that it could not function at all. I was particularly struck that way last year when an amendment was offered on the floor of the Senate to provide that officials of labor unions should be subject to frequent recall elections. Yet U.S. Senators, who can send our men to Iwo Jima or Korea to risk their lives in defense of his country, are not now subject to recall. Those people ask for a higher degree of democracy in labor unions than is asked of Members of the U.S. Senate or of Members of the House or of the President of the United States, who hold sovereign control over every resident of the United States.

It seems to me a little bit inconsistent to propose that an official of a labor union should be subject to recall, lest democracy be endangered in the labor union, but that U.S. Senators should not be subject to recall. I believe we must keep this whole subject in proper perspective. I share the views the Senator from Minnesota is expressing in his very fine speech today. I agree that we must give financial protection to the people who pay dues and that we must safeguard union funds, and must also see to it that union elections are held in accordance with democratic principles, free from coercion. That does not mean that we must have an absolutely letter-perfect bill—and that if we do not have such a letter-perfect bill—we should not pass any bill at all. I again commend the distinguished Senator from Minnesota for the excellent speech he is making on this subject.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I thank the distinguished Senator from Oregon. His sentiments and observations are mine also. He has stated concisely and succinctly the philosophy which should guide us in voting on the many amendments which will be offered to the bill. We are taking a very substantial forward step with the proposed legislation. It is one which will keep us in stride with the needs and necessities of the labor-management picture.

I should like now to address myself to one of the several amendments intended to be proposed by the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] and which is presently lying on the table. I refer to the amendment to extend the secondary boycott provisions of the National Labor Relations Act—4–15–59–C. I stress the word "extend," Mr. President, for this is a practice which has been regulated since 1947.

Mr. President, I do not discuss these features of the National Labor Relations Act without at least a working knowledge of the law. I served on the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare for 4 years. It was my privilege during those 4 years to be chairman of the Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations. I participated in the debates relating to the Taft-Hartley law, the effort to repeal it, and the effort to amend it. In fact, it was my privilege to work side by side with the late Senator from Ohio, the very distinguished and honored Member of the Senate, Robert A. Taft, in proposing two amendments to the Taft-Hartley law, which were adopted. One of those amendments will be attempted to be repealed at this time. But I hope we shall not go backward in this debate. I refer to the amendment relating to the preelection rights of the building trades. That was the Taft-Humphrey amendment to the National Labor Relations Act—the so-called Taft-Hartley law. It is a good amendment. I might add that if we had at that time the distinguished leader of the Republican ranks, the late Senator from Ohio, Mr. Taft, and the then junior Senator from Minnesota working together and agreeing on an amendment to the Taft-Hartley law, it must have had some substance and some worthwhile aspects, because Senator Taft and I did not always see eye to eye on some of the labor-management problems.

Congress in the National Labor Relations Act enacted stringent curbs on secondary boycotts. And the National Labor Relations Board is administering the secondary boycott prohibitions—section 8(b)(4)—with a zeal which resolves few doubts in favor of the legitimacy of any questioned activity. So much so that the courts of appeals have frequently reversed the Board for going too far. The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, for example, this past January set aside a Board order based on an alleged violation of section 8(b)(4) because in prohibiting the picketing in that case the Board was prohibiting, not a secondary boycott, but primary picketing. The Board had failed, said the court, "to preserve 'the right of labor organizations to bring pressure to bear on offending employers in primary labor disputes.'"

The Board failed to heed the admonition of the Supreme Court that section 8(b)(4) must be interpreted to harmonize "the dual congressional objectives of preserving the right of labor organizations to bring pressure to bear on offending employers in primary labor disputes and of shielding unoffending employers and others from pressures in controversies not their own"—N.L.R.B. v. Denver Bldg. & Const. Trades Council, 341 U.S. 675, 692.

This proposed amendment—the one I referred to earlier, offered by the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER]—deals then with an activity which is already regulated and regulated plentifully. The effect of this existing regulation bears remembering. Broadly speaking, when a union has a dispute with company A concerning the conditions of employment at its plant, the union may not call out the employees of company B on strike, it may not picket the premises of company B to induce its employees to strike, and it may not induce even a refusal to work limited to not handling the products of company A. These means of bringing pressure on company A through company B are prohibited by law. And these are prohibited even though company A is paying substandard wages which are depressing and undermining the union standards throughout the industry. The sweatshop employer, no less than any other, in present law is protected. When Congress enacted section 8(b)(4) it embraced the premise that no distinction can be drawn between "good secondary boycotts and bad secondary boycotts"—CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 93, part 3, page 4198.

It is proposed now, however, that it be declared an unfair labor practice to threaten, coerce, or restrain any person to engage in a boycott. But, it will be said, all that is prohibited is the threat, not persuasion. The fact is, however, that there is no meaningful line between the two, in this field at least. That is, there is no meaningful line which I think a legislative body can develop in theory. Any meaningful line would have to be determined in a court of law in light of the situation.

For example, suppose a union agent tells an employer, "We are having a strike at company A. Cooperate with us by not buying his goods until the strike is over." This is clearly persuasion. Suppose the union agent adds: "We have always gotten along well together. We want to be able to continue to do so. Do you think it would be wise for you to jeopardize our good relations by continuing to buy company A's products?" The question now is, Has persuasion passed to a veiled threat? Suppose the union agent goes on to say, "We realize that, because you have been barely able to get by, you have not complied strictly with our agreement but we have been willing to close our eyes to it. But our eyes will not remain closed if you don't stop buying company A's products." The question is, Is this an open threat?

At present, "a union is free to approach an employer to persuade him to engage in a boycott, so long as it refrains from the specifically prohibited means of coercion through inducement of employees." (Local 1976, United Brotherhood of Carpenters v. N. L. R. B., 357 U.S. 93, 99.) This is nothing that can or should be changed by statute, as I indicated earlier. If an employer-customer continues to buy the product of the struck employer, he helps that struck employer; if an employer-customer discontinues buying the product of the struck employer, he helps the union. But whatever he does he unavoidably helps one side or another. Surely the union must remain free to persuade the customer to help it, just as the struck employer is free to persuade the customer to continue to buy his product. This is but the exercise of free speech on both sides of the controversy.

It does not appear wise to me to enact by what might be called legislative determination this slippery line between threats and persuasion. Nor is there any need to do so. Actually, I am afraid this kind of amendment will confuse the situation, which throughout the years has been clarified by court interpretation. The actual act of calling the employees of the neutral employer out on strike, or the actual act of picketing his premises to induce the employees to strike, is now forbidden. It is, therefore, just idle talk to threaten to do either.

Just as we allow free speech to an employer in persuading his employees not to join a union—that is provided for in the Taft-Hartley law—so must we allow free speech to the union.

Furthermore, the proposed amendment is not even limited to a threat to strike or to induce a strike; it extends to any threat. But if the prohibited act is confined to a strike or inducement to strike, why should the prohibited threat extend beyond that?

The amendment is not limited only to threats. It also prohibits the union to coerce, or restrain.

By the way, those words sound pretty ugly until we start to examine them in the light of the law and in the light of actual labor-management practice.

At present a union may distribute leaflets at the premises of a neutral employer to persuade consumers not to buy the product of the struck employer. That is the law at the present time. If the persuasion is successful the neutral loses sales. Does this constitute restraint and coercion of the neutral employer? Under present law, it does not; but if the amendment shall be adopted, it will be necessary to go through a whole series of court actions again, and no one in the labor-management picture will know for many years where he stands. As a matter of fact, some of the amendments I have examined lend themselves not to labor-management peace, not to labor-management stability, but to labor-management instability and to confusion confounded. I suggest that rather than try to add to the troubles and the complexity of the law, we should try to simplify matters and learn how to utilize the law which we have, where that law is just and equitable.

The Board has indeed held that to place an employer on a "We Do Not Patronize" list is to restrain and coerce him. The Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit set aside the Board's determination and pointed out that the union's conduct was "within the general area of protection of the first amendment guaranteeing free speech." (NLRB v. IAM, Local 942, C.A. 9, No. 15, 814, February 4, 1959, sl. op. p. 6.)

I fear that this proposal may well invade this area. I ask the Senate to hold with Chief Justice Stone that the "publication, unaccompanied by violence, of a notice that the employer is unfair to organized labor and requesting the public not to patronize him is an exercise of the right of free speech guaranteed by the first amendment which cannot be made unlawful by act of Congress."

The citation is a familiar one to lawyers and even to some of us laymen: United States v. Hutcheson, 312 U.S. 219, 243.

To distribute leaflets at the premises of a neutral employer to persuade customers not to buy a struck product is one form of consumer appeal. To peacefully picket the customer entrances, with a placard asking that the struck product not be bought, is another form. I fear that consumer picketing may also be the target of the words "coerce, or restrain." I fear that, in addition to the existing foreclosure of the union on strike from making any effective appeal to the employees of the so-called neutral employer, the union by this amendment is now to be effectively sealed off from even an appeal to the consumers.

The National Labor Relations Act makes it an unfair labor practice for a union "to engage in, or to induce or encourage the employees of any employer to engage in, a strike or a concerted refusal" to work. That is the law, and it is applied and upheld. But the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] would change the words "employees of any employer" to "any individual employed by any person," and would delete the word "concerted."

This change may have as one purpose to forbid inducement of even a single employee acting alone to stop working for his neutral employer. Three courts of appeals have already construed the existing language to reach this result. And the inducement of a single employee's refusal to work at a neutral employer's premises is hardly substantial enough to be worth considering.

But I fear that more than appears at first glance is involved in this proposal.

At first glance, a layman would be inclined to conclude that the amendment was quite reasonable. It is when we consider the amendment within the framework of existing law, and when we consider its application by means of the National Labor Relations Board, and, consequently, by means of court interpretations and decisions, that we realize that there would be trouble.

As it now stands, section 8(b)(4) does not prohibit appeals or requests directed to supervisory or managerial employees, because these individuals are not employees within the statutory definition. But they are surely individuals; and to substitute the word "individual" for the word "employees" would place requests and appeals to them within the prohibition of the law. For example, an appeal to a supervisor to decline to accept a shipment from a struck employer is inducement of "any individual employed by any person" to engage in a "refusal" to work.

If this is the effect of the proposal, its adoption would completely isolate the union from any effective approach to the neutral employer, to persuade him or to encourage him to cooperate with the union by declining to do business with the struck employer, for the supervisors are the arms and legs of management. They are management on the job. The normal and natural approach to the neutral employer is through his supervisory and managerial personnel present on the job. Therefore, to prohibit the union from approaching them would be to cut off the union from its normal channels of communication. It would be a mockery to say that the union is free to persuade a neutral employer to assist it, but to deny the union access to the employer's supervisory and managerial staff. Especially is this so in the case of a corporate employer, who can act only through his supervisors and managers. How high in the corporation's officialdom would a union have to go before it could find a corporate agent with whom it would be safe to talk?

This is not defined in the amendment. It would have to come under some board or some judicial definition or interpretation. It would require action by the National Labor Relations Board, and, of course, such action would undoubtedly be appealed, and then there would be a whole series of court decisions as to the meaning of the word "individual", as contrasted to the statutory meaning of the word "employee." We have a complete interpretation of the meaning of the word "employee"; but we do not have such an interpretation of the meaning of the word "individual", as it applies to labor-management relations. I realize that these points may seem to amount to splitting hairs; but they indicate the problems involved in connection with such matters in labor-management relations.

I have given considerable attention to this proposed amendment, which is both technical and complicated. I have considered this matter carefully, because during my years of service on the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare I handled a number of such matters, and this is one about which I have at least a layman's working knowledge. When I considered the amendment, I said to myself, "This can lead to all kinds of trouble."

Mr. President, if the records of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare are examined, it will be found that this subject was discussed at length, several years running; and at no time was there a majority of the committee—in fact, not even close to a majority—who felt that any extension or expansion of the secondary boycott provision should be agreed to.

One last word, and I shall have said enough to show the effects of this proposed amendment. It purports to say that a secondary employer who performs the "farmed out" work of a struck employer is not entitled to the sheltered status of the neutral. He may be struck and picketed just as the primary employer is himself. This adds nothing to section 8(b)(4). As the section now stands, it does not protect a neutral employer who does the primary employer's work. In other words, the present law cannot be avoided by farming out the work of the struck plant. This matter is presently taken care of. As I have said, the applicable section of the Taft-Hartley law, as it now stands, does not protect a neutral employer who does the primary employer's work; and no amendment is needed for this.

But there is a very real danger that the amendment, far from confirming the present interpretation of section 8(b)(4) in this respect, would, in fact, detract from it, for the amendment would, according to my observations, permit a strike against the secondary employer only when he "has contracted or agreed with" a struck employer to do the latter's work. But, as the matter now stands, such a strike is permissible, whether or not there is a contract or an agreement, just so long as the secondary employer is actually doing struck work.

Here, again, Mr. President, we get into legalisms. In other words, has there been a formal agreement or an oral or a written contract? If there has been, then, under the proposed amendment, such protection of a neutral employer would be removed. But under present law that precise definition is not required. In other words, as I have pointed out, present law says such a strike is permissible, regardless of whether there is a contract or agreement, just so long as the secondary employer is actually doing struck work. As the leading case states, the secondary employers are not protected "whether or not the primary employer makes any direct arrangement with the secondary employers providing the services." (N.L.R.B. v. Business Machine Board, 228 F. 2d 553, 559 (C. A. 2), cert. denied, 351 U.S. 962.) Furthermore, the amendment pertains only to "any strike against, or refusal to perform services for," the secondary employer. Surely it must also be permissible to picket the secondary employer or otherwise to induce his employees to strike.

Section 8(b)(4) of the National Labor Relations Act, as it now stands, is an effective curb on secondary boycotts. I am quite sure that the Congress feels that it has been an effective curb on secondary boycotts.

One of the real justifications for the Taft-Hartley Act, in the view of those who favored it, was the efficacy and the adequacy of the so-called secondary-boycott provisions of that law. It was around those provisions that the defenders of the Taft-Hartley Act rallied. But now we see that these provisions are supposed to be even further extended—or further confounded, I may say. It has already taken us 10 years to get them untangled. But after having had 10 years in which to obtain working decisions and working, practical arrangements in regard to what is known as the secondary boycott and in regard to how the provisions of section 8(b)(4) are to be applied to practical situations, now it is proposed that the Congress adopt an amendment to rewrite the language. Well, Mr. President, many a season and many a year will pass, if that amendment is adopted, before an employer or a union will know what the meaning of the law is. The legal officers will have to do their work; the National Labor Relations Board will have to interpret the language—because the language of a law means little or nothing until it is interpreted; and, after the National Labor Relations Board has interpreted the meaning of the words "coerce" or "threaten" or "force" or "restrain," the courts will, in turn, have to decide how those words apply to the cases in question.

Mr. President, legislation to extend or to expand the curb on secondary boycotts, as provided in the amendment we have been discussing, is, in my judgment, both unnecessary and potentially harmful, for the extensions invade, first, the areas of free speech; second, the rightful access of a union to persuade employers; and, third, the rightful enlistment by a union of consumer support.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I reiterate my hope that the Senate will pass the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959. The Senate had before it a similar bill a year ago. I voted for it then. I desire to register my vote for the pending bill now. I believe the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare has done a very, very good job. We have watched this proposed legislation develop for months. A tremendous amount of testimony has been developed, and much staff and senatorial work has been done to make the bill a legislative reality.

It is a sound and a good proposal. It is a significant move forward, and one which merits bipartisan support. I hope the support will not only be bipartisan, but that the bill will be overwhelmingly supported by both parties.

I hope S. 1555 will not become burdened down with modifications, deletions, and additions, through floor amendments, so as to jeopardize its passage entirely. To me this would be a grave mistake, which we would long regret.

It is my feeling that the amendments which needed to be in this bill have already been included. The Committee on Labor and Public Welfare did not deny anyone the opportunity to be heard. Anyone who had a constructive proposal, or any other kind of proposal, could well have offered it to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare; and members of the committee, who are experienced in this kind of legislation, would have considered it, and, if it had had merit, it could well have been included in the bill now before the Senate.

I shall encourage one and all to vote for S. 1555 as reported by the committee. It has my wholehearted support and assistance.

WASTE IN THE ADMINISTRATION'S SURPLUS PROPERTY DISPOSAL PROGRAM, WITH SPECIAL REFERENCE TO CARPENTERSVILLE, ILL.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, for some time I have been critical of what I believe is excessive fat and waste in the procurement policies of the military services.

As of June 30, 1958, the Department of Defense had on hand over $29 billion in real property and $119 billion in personal property. These statistics and totals are given in a very accurate study by the House Committee on Government Operations of the 85th Congress, on page 65. Of this enormous total, $44 billion was in the supply system inventory, locked up in warehouses here and abroad.

When these figures are examined more closely, as they are in the report, on page 98 and following, it is seen that of the $44 billion in the supply system inventory, only $27 billion are for peacetime operating needs and for the additional supplies which are adjudged necessary for our Armed Forces in time of war. The remaining $17 billion is in excess stocks. This is admitted by the Defense Department to be in excess of both war and peacetime needs. This is a shocking total.

It has been my contention that by drawing down on these excess supplies, the military departments could save $2 to $3 billion in the fiscal year 1960 budget. These funds could then be used to increase our existing and potential supplies of missiles and to keep the Army and Marine Corps combat troops at the number which Congress has authorized, and for which it has appropriated, and which the President has failed to carry out.

WASTE IN SURPLUS DISPOSAL

My suspicions that there is great waste in the procurement and use of these vast military supplies have been fortified by some specific events in my own State in recent months. The Chicago Sun Times, and their able reporter, Mr. Richard Lewis, have uncovered a scandalous situation with respect to the handling of surplus property at Carpentersville, Ill.

What happened in my own State was this: Hundreds of thousands of dollars of so-called Federal surplus property was donated by the Federal Government to the State of Illinois, ostensibly for the use of schools, nonprofit hospitals, and civil defense.

Equipment included cranes, tractors, trucks, road graders, flashlights, penpoints, stop watches, parkas, beds, load-lifting machines, loaders, chain hoists, compressors, motors, generators, lathes, mill machines, road rollers, ditching machines, grinders, pumps, portable powerplants, typewriters, desks, paper, adding machines, binoculars, beds, steel cabinets, wool cloth, searchlights, athletic equipment, including track shoes—and it would be interesting to note for what purpose track shoes were regarded as combat equipment—telescopes, barber kits, gasoline pumps, swivel chairs—I know a swivel chair is a very important item of military equipment—stamping pads, card files, and even a calculating machine to add up all the excess property.

SHOULD THESE ITEMS BE SURPLUS?

Let me say that my first objection to this is that there certainly seem to be items among those which the Federal Government has declared as surplus for which the Federal Government should be able to find more useful purposes. I doubt that some of them were actual surplus. I suspect that the Government is buying similar or like equipment to be used in other places, and I think there is tremendous waste in a procurement system in which so many items of these kinds could conceivably be declared surplus items.

In fact, while the administration was disposing of a bus to the State of Illinois, it was asking in the current budget for over $3 million net, after trade-ins, with which to purchase no less than 787 new buses. The figures for this item can be found on page 535 of the budget for 1959 and 1960, Item M60, Department of Defense.

Of course, the Government has also been purchasing additional typewriters, steel cabinets, wool cloth, and many other items it was disposing of so lavishly; although I grant it is quite possible that they were not buying addition track shoes for combat purposes.

After receiving these hundreds of thousands of dollars of Federal surplus items, the State government then distributed them. This was done by the State superintendent of public instruction, Mr. Vernon L. Nickell, whose administration was already scandal-ridden by his handling of surplus foods for the school lunch program.

SMALL TOWN GOT $400,000 OF SURPLUS ITEMS

The new scandal is what happened to the items which were distributed to Carpentersville, Ill. This is a village of about 12,000 people near Elgin and about 40 miles west of Chicago. The Civil Defense Corps of this small city of Carpentersville, Ill., was issued Federal surplus property valued at no less than $345,733.85. This village of 12,000 people received, in fact, more surplus property for civil defense purposes than the Chicago board of education received during the entire school year 1957 and 1958 for a city of 3.75 million people.

It is, of course, suspicious when a small city can receive such huge amounts of so-called Federal surplus items, many of which would hardly seem to be related to civil defense and many of which one would think the military services of the United States would need, or, if their procurement policies were proper, should never have been declared surplus in the first place.

However, not only has the Federal Government given to the State vast quantities of items which one doubts are surplus, or if they are surplus, which should never have been surplus if proper procedures had been followed; and not only has the State of Illinois and the former superintendent of schools distributed almost $400,000 of such surpluses to one village of 12,000 people; but in addition to all this, vast quantities of the surplus stocks distributed to Carpentersville have ended up free of charge in the yards of a private excavating and earthmoving company which is the prime contractor for a multimillion-dollar housing development in the area.

ITEMS PRIVATE CONTRACTOR RECEIVED

I point out that among the so-called surplus items which ended up in the yards of the private contractor and which apparently were used by that firm were:

First. A 3,000-pound fork lift which had cost the U.S. Air Force $3,645. It was turned over to the Carpentersville Civil Defense Corp. for $50.

Second. A model P. & H. crane, with a U.S. Army Corps of Engineers acquisition cost of $27,888. This cost Carpentersville $200. It was being used by the private contractor.

Third. A boom crane shovel, which had cost the Corps of Engineers $32,733. Carpentersville got it from the State for $200.

Fourth. A 15-ton dump truck which cost the Air Force $18,200. It was sold to Carpentersville for $200.

Fifth. A GMC compressor truck which had cost the Army $2,114.

I ask unanimous consent that an article by Mr. Lewis, together with an editorial from the Chicago Sun-Times, be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CIVIL DEFENSE EQUIPMENT WINDS UP IN PRIVATE USE

(By Richard Lewis)

The Sun-Times has uncovered instances in which Federal surplus property, intended for use by the State and local agencies, has wound up in private hands.

Involved is property valued by the United States at more than $500,000.

The equipment, including huge earthmoving and construction machines, was donated to the State by the U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

MACHINERY TRACED

Under Federal regulations, it was to be distributed to schools, nonprofit hospitals, and civil defense by the State Agency for Surplus Property, now under Governor Stratton's control.

The Sun-Times has found that U.S. surplus machinery costing more than $100,000 is now in the yards of a Kane County contracting firm, which has been using it for months.

The machinery is part of a mountainous load of Federal surplus valued at $345,733.85 and acquired in 1 year from the State by the Carpentersville Civil Defense Corps.

Carpentersville, a village of about 12,000 in Kane County near Elgin, received more U.S. surplus equipment (in terms of U.S. valuation) during 1957–58 than the Chicago Board of Education.

The only cost charged by the State for the equipment, consisting of about 2,000 items, was $7,811.50 in handling charges. Of this, $962.81 remains unpaid to the State agency, its records show.

The private contracting firm that got the use of much of the equipment is Steffan Bros. of Carpentersville, prime contractor for the multimillion-dollar Meadowdale development in the Fox River Valley.

The development includes a 4,000-home housing project, a giant shopping center and an auto race track 40 miles northwest of Chicago. The developer is Leonard W. Besinger & Associates, Carpentersville.

ARRANGEMENT EXPLAINED

Ed Steffan, president of Steffan Bros., said he was using cranes, trucks, tractors, and other Federal surplus in his business as the result of a verbal agreement with the Carpentersville Civil Defense Corps.

The arrangement, he said, provided that Steffan Bros. would maintain the equipment against the day when disaster might strike the village. Then it would be made immediately available to civil defense, he said.

"We've just spent about $2,000 putting new gears in that crane out back," Steffan said. He pointed to a U.S. surplus crane with an acquisition cost of $27,000, which the Carpentersville civil defense had picked up from the State for $200.

"We feel we ought to get some use out of it," Steffan said. "If you don't keep this machinery operating, it simply deteriorates."

INTERLOCKING INTEREST

Steffan said he does all the excavating for the Meadowdale development—which is beginning to rival Park Forest in size as a community created by a single developer.

He said the developer, Besinger & Associates, has a financial interest in his firm.

Leonard W. Besinger, head of Besinger & Associates, could not be reached for comment by the Sun-Times. His son, Leonard Jr., an associate in the firm, said he understood "we have an interest" in Steffan Bros.

FEDERAL INVESTIGATION

The Sun-Times found that Federal authorities are investigating the disposition of this and other Federal surplus costing $400,000.

Approximately 2,600 items of U.S. surplus donated to the State and distributed by the State agency for surplus property are involved.

The equipment ranges from cranes, tractors, trucks, road graders and a bus to flashlights, penpoints, stopwatches, parkas, and beds.

Until last January 1, the State surplus property agency had been operating under the supervision of Vernon L. Nickell, former State superintendent of public instruction, whose term expired January 12.

(Nickell figured in a Sun-Times investigation of overcharges in the distribution of U.S. surplus food donated to the State by the U.S. Agriculture Department for schools and State welfare institutions.)

AGENCY TRANSFERRED

Both the distribution of surplus equipment and of surplus food were under Nickell's administration. Twelve days before Nickell, a Republican, surrendered the office to his Democratic successor, George T. Wilkins, Governor Stratton transferred the agency and all of its records to his department of finance. He left food distribution in Wilkins' hands.

The Sun-Times has learned that the State agency's operations had been under scrutiny since last July by the U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, the U.S. Office of Defense and Civilian Mobilization, and even the Illinois State police.

It also learned that various transactions involved have been called to the attention of U.S. Attorney Robert Tieken and State's Attorney Benjamin S. Adamowski.

This situation came to light when the Sun-Times examined the surplus agency's records in Springfield after discovering that thousands of dollars' worth of Federal surplus equipment had been delivered to private contractors after being distributed by the State.

Governor Stratton's office said the Governor had no comment on the surplus property situation.

The most interesting aspects of the surplus property situation were found in Carpentersville.

BEGAN IN 1957

The village's record draw of surplus appears to have begun July 1, 1957, when Douglas C. Scott, a mail carrier in the Carpentersville post office, was appointed village civil defense director and authorized to obtain surplus property from the State by J. L. Homer, executive officer of the Illinois Civil Defense Agency.

Shortly after receiving the authorization, Scott began acquiring the surplus from the Illinois State Fairgrounds and a private warehouse where the State agency stored the equipment and from the U.S. Engineer depot in Granite City.

Some of the equipment consisted of load-lifting machines, cranes, trucks, tractors, loaders, chain hoists, compressors, motors, generators, lathes, a mill machine, a drilling machine, a welding machine, a road roller, a ditching machine, a grinder, a road scraper, pumps, a portable powerplant and even a 29-passenger bus.

ITEMS LISTED

In addition, the Carpentersville Civil Defense Corps received typewriters, desks, paper, adding machines, binoculars, beds, steel cabinets (in 372 sections), wool cloth (145 yards of it), parkas, flashlights, searchlights, athletic equipment, including track shoes, telescopes, barber kits, gasoline pumps, a swivel chair, stamping pads (40), card files and other items, including a calculating machine to tote it all up.

These items were shipped to Carpentersville between July 1, 1957, and July 28, 1958.

The Sun-Times found the following items in the yards of Steffan Bros., excavating and earth-moving contractors:

1. A 3,000-pound forklift, which had cost the U.S. Air Force $3,645. State records show it was turned over to the Carpentersville Civil Defense Corp., August 27, 1957, for $50.

2. A model P. & H. crane, with a U.S. Army Corps of Engineers acquisition cost of $27,880. Carpentersville got it from the State for $200 September 25, 1957. This piece of equipment was being used by Steffan Bros. in a gravel pit at Carpentersville last Friday.

3. A boom crane shovel, which had cost the Corps of Engineers $32,733. Carpentersville got it from the State for $200 February 14, 1958.

4. A 15-ton dump truck, which had cost the Air Force $18,200. Carpentersville got it from the State for $200 January 27, 1958.

This equipment currently is in use by Steffan Bros. in the gravel pit. Friday afternoon, the crane was loading aggregate into the truck.

5. A GMC compressor truck, which had cost the Army $2,114. It was parked in the contractor's yards.

OPERATIONAL READINESS

State records show this equipment was donated to the Carpentersville Civil Defense Corps for the purposes of "operational readiness" and "training."

Records of the Illinois Civil Defense Agency fail to show that the Carpentersville corps has ever held an exercise.

In addition, the Sun-Times found another crane, an aggregate loader, a 5-ton cargo truck, and other equipment bearing U.S. markings parked in the contractor's yards.

VISIT SPRINGFIELD

Steffan said that Scott, the village's first civil defense director, had frequently flown to Springfield to get the equipment in an airplane owned by the Besinger firm.

Steffan said Scott was accompanied by David Hoppe, a cement contractor associated with the Besinger firm and Steffan Bros. in the Meadowdale development.

Steffan admitted that some of the surplus equipment had been used in the development of the Meadowdale International Raceways, an auto track on Illinois 31 near Dundee, the Meadowdale shopping center and the Meadowdale housing development.

"We needed every piece of equipment we could get," Steffan said. "There's never enough when you're building what amounts to a new city.

"The equipment is and always has been instantly available in the event of a disaster."

Scott confirmed Steffan's account of how the surplus equipment came to be used by a private contractor.

Scott said he had quit as the village mail carrier and has engaged in a business venture, which he declined to describe.

He said he was accompanied by representatives of Steffan Bros. as well as by Hoppe on his trips to Springfield to equip the Civil Defense Corps.

Asked why he had acquired such a large volume of equipment, which had cost the United States more than $345,000, Scott said:

"I wanted to make Carpentersville the best-equipped civil defense force in this area.

"You see, Carpentersville is very strategic. It lies between two target cities, Rockford and Chicago. In the event of a disaster, if one of these cities was hit, we could get this stuff moving either way.

"It was a good plan and the State civil defense people approved it."

Scott said that the plan was coming along nicely as voluminous stores of surplus rolled into Carpentersville until he found that Steffan Bros. was using the stuff outside the village limits.

Scott said that when he protested, he was fired as civil-defense director by "hizzoner, the mayor."

The mayor is Colin Livingston, president of the Carpentersville Village Board of Trustees.

CONCEALS REASONS

Livingston said there were specific reasons for firing Scott, but he declined to discuss them.

He said that he appointed Hoppe, the cement contractor, as Scott's successor.

State records show that Hoppe continued acquiring surplus equipment for the State.

But Hoppe told the Sun-Times that although the mayor appointed him, "I was taken off before I was sworn in."

Asked who removed him as civil defense director, Hoppe said: "The mayor did."

WHO'S DIRECTOR NOW?

Asked how he acquired surplus for the Carpentersville civil defense corps if he had never legally been the village's civil-defense director, Hoppe declined to comment.

He also refused to comment on Steffan's assertion that Hoppe had gone to Springfield with Scott to pick up surplus.

Who is civil defense director of Carpentersville in charge of equipment costing $345,000?

Mayor Livingston wasn't sure.

"If anyone is," he said, "I guess I am. But I'm not doing anything about it."

THE CARPENTERSVILLE SCANDAL

Eight months ago the Federal Government learned that U.S. surplus machinery worth thousands of dollars had been turned over by the Illinois town of Carpentersville to a private contractor. The Carpentersville Civil Defense Corps had turned over trucks, tractors, cranes, and other propety to Steffan Bros., a prime contractor for the multi-million-dollar Meadowdale shopping and housing development in the Fox River Valley.

A Government inspector's report filed at that time said there appeared to be "implications of fraud and misuse of Government property" involved.

There was some newspaper publicity at the time and the general public might have assumed that action had been taken by State, local, or Federal authorities.

The fact is, however, that nothing was done about correcting the situation. The contractor continued to use public property for a private use. He did not even pay a rental fee. Not until the Chicago Sun-Times, after its own extensive investigation, printed a news story by Richard Lewis, with pictures of the machinery still being used, did any official step in and correct the misuse of public property.

The story appeared on our front page Tuesday. That same day Frank O. Starr, regional director of the Office of Civilian Defense Mobilization at Battle Creek, Mich., moved to repossess the machinery. He said that Carpentersville had been suspended from the surplus-property program last July 24.

This case is another good example of the manner in which a free and energetic press must continuously ride herd on public officials in the public interest.

We do not know, of course, whether there would have been action in the Carpentersville case if we had not published the current facts about it. But it seems to us that 8 months is a long time for repossession of the equipment to be started. There are plenty of questions that should be answered by all public officials involved.

Last July 28, Robert M. Woodward, State civil defense director, said he had ordered the equipment impounded. He said he had requested an investigation by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the U.S. attorney for the northern district of Illinois, the chief investigator for the State's attorney general, the Illinois Department of Public Safety, and the State's attorney of Kane County.

Woodward says he was told that U.S. Attorney Robert Tieken advised against repossessing the equipment because it would interfere with investigation by the FBI. Tieken, to the contrary, says he told Woodward to go ahead and repossess the machinery.

Buck-passing of this sort and the entire disposition of surplus property by the agency that Governor Stratton recently transferred to his own control are proper subjects, we believe, for a legislative investigation such as has been proposed by Majority Leader William G. Clark, Democrat of Chicago.

SERIOUS QUESTIONS RAISED

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, this is a scandalous situation.

First. Why should such valuable property be declared surplus in the first place? What kind of procurement policies do we have when such things as forklift trucks, cranes, dump trucks, compressor trucks, as well as buses, typewriters, lathes, and hundreds of other items are sold for less than 1 cent on the dollar at the same time that our military services are buying similar items for 100 cents on the dollar.

Second. Why should it be virtually given by the State to small communities for so-called civil defense activities? Is it not absurd that a village of 12,000 should receive almost $400,000 worth of equipment for civil defense purposes?

Third. How is it that much of this valuable property ends up in the hands of a private contractor?

Fourth. Why is it that no action was taken on this matter during the period of 8 months from the time the Federal Government first learned that these supplies were in the hands of private contractors, and after a Government inspector's report stated that there appeared to be "implications of fraud and misuse of Government property" involved. The reasons for this delay should be probed.

These are serious questions which need serious answers. There are real questions about waste in our procurement and surplus disposal policies, and about misuse of such items by the officials of the State of Illinois, and about possible fraud and waste on the part of numerous individuals, both at the local and State level.

GOVERNMENT COULD SAVE MILLIONS

I repeat what I have said on numerous previous occasions. There are so many instances of obvious waste and misuse of our military items, and so many valuable items which are declared surplus and sold for only a few cents on the dollar—and in this case for much less than that—and so many instances of windfall gains by a few people who happen to be on the inside of these deals, that I believe the Federal Government must lose several billions of dollars a year on such activities. I believe that with more care, better planning, and some willingness on the part of the Defense Department, the Budget Bureau, and the President himself, to act on these matters, we could save the Federal Government as much as $2 or $3 billions. This then could be used to buy more missiles and to keep our combat troops at existing strength. Possibly a little of the money could be used to balance the budget.

COMPTROLLER GENERAL SHOULD INVESTIGATE

As a result of all this, I have addressed a letter to the Comptroller General asking that he determine to what extent the military departments have been purchasing similar or exact items which they have, at the same time, declared to be surplus. I have furthermore sent to him a partial list of the items which were obtained as surplus by the State of Illinois civil defense agency authorities and by the civil defense groups at Carpentersville, Ill.

I now publicly ask the Comptroller General to conduct a searching and relentless investigation of the disposal of Government property in general and of the Carpentersville and allied situations in particular.

HENRY CLAY AND THE MOVEMENT FOR INDEPENDENCE IN VENEZUELA

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, several days ago I was pleased and honored to receive an invitation from representatives of Americans, resident in Venezuela, asking me to speak in Caracas this Sunday, April 19, on the 149th anniversary of the commencement of the struggle of the Venezuelan people for independence. I was asked to discuss the efforts of a great Kentuckian, Henry Clay, whose birthday was last Sunday, April 12, in connection with the revolution of the Venezuelan people. I was extremely sorry that I could not accept the invitation, but I wish to speak briefly today about the influence of Henry Clay, upon the movement in Latin America toward independence, over 100 years ago.

Mr. President, I take great pleasure in saluting the Venezuelan people as they celebrate the anniversary of the beginning of their independence movement. The years of our generation are in some ways reminiscent of the early years of the preceding century, when we were seeking to develop and preserve our republican form of government, and the struggling Latin American colonies were seeking to win their freedom. Then as now, authoritarian governments covered wide areas of the globe. Then, the concepts of democratic government were new and threatened with engulfment, as they are in some parts of the world today. Now they are assailed by methods total in their scope—ideological, economic and military. But consistently throughout this time of striving, the world has looked with hope and confidence to Latin America.

For all of us who believe in freedom and democracy, its reemergence in Venezuela and other Latin-American countries is a victory in which all who love liberty can share.

Nearly 150 years ago, a great Kentucky statesman, Henry Clay, made common cause with fighters for South American liberation—with great leaders such as Simon Bolivar, Francisco de Miranda, and the peoples who followed them with courage From the young Republic to the north, Henry Clay's voice in the House of Representatives in May of 1818 was the first to speak out strongly with encouragement and sympathy for the struggling and emerging Latin American countries. In Spain and Europe as well, it is said, his words burst like a clap of thunder from the skies.

The vision of Henry Clay—the vision of the common cause of Latin America and the United States—is as worthy today as it was then. Our friendship, growing from the same experience and traditions of freedom, should be nourished and made to live again in its finest form, for we have much to bind us together: Belief in human rights, ideals of democratic government, and of social and economic justice.

Venezuela is vitally reaffirming these beliefs in its present political life. In doing so it strengthens the fabric of our inter-American life. And it is on the basis of our democratic faith of action and helpfulness to each other that the peoples of this hemisphere can make the most effective contribution to world order, freedom, and peace.

Perhaps I can do no better than to quote from Henry Clay himself, who in referring to South America, said in a memorable speech in the Congress on May 24, 1818:

> Within this vast region we behold the most sublime and interesting objects of creation; the loftiest mountains, the most majestic rivers in the world; the richest mines of precious metals, and the choicest productions of the earth. We behold there a spectacle still more interesting and sublime—the glorious spectacle of 18 millions of people struggling to burst their chains and be free. * * * We perceive that nature has, as it were, ordained that this people and this country shall ultimately constitute several different nations. * * * I am persuaded that independence has struck deep root.
> When I contemplate (this) glorious struggle * * * I think I behold (my) brother rising, by the power and energy of his fine native genius, to the manly rank which nature, and nature's God, intended for him.

I like very much the sentiment he then expressed—one based on the necessity of mutual respect and equality. Henry Clay said:

> Anxious as I am that they should be free governments, we have no right to prescribe for them. They are, and ought to be, the sole judges for themselves. But I am strongly inclined to believe that they will in most if not all parts of their country, establish free governments. * * * They will establish their independence, and secure the enjoyment of those rights and blessings which rightfully belong to them.

I am very hopeful that, as we consider our present relations with the countries of Latin America, the encouragement which Henry Clay gave to Venezuela and Latin America at the beginning of their revolution and struggle for independence, and the wise advice he gave our country, will again animate our relations and our peoples. If it does, I am confident that our relationships with Latin America will continue to grow in strength, in respect, and true friendship.

Mr. President, I desire to discuss another subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky has the floor.

DISTRIBUTION OF SURPLUS FOOD TO NEEDY FAMILIES

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, I am delighted that the Department of Agriculture has decided to buy dried eggs for distribution to needy families in Kentucky and other States.

I very much appreciate this action of Secretary of Agriculture Ezra Taft Benson, which was announced late yesterday. I am sure that many families in the distressed Kentucky areas, which I visited again only last week, will be deeply grateful.

I hope this policy will be continued and extended so that some of the other foods beyond the very limited kinds in Government-owned stocks may also be made available. Thousands of hungry families in eastern Kentucky and other States desperately need a better variety of food and a more nearly adequate minimum diet.

Since last fall, I have repeatedly urged the Secretary of Agriculture to take immediate steps to make additional kinds of food available to needy persons. I made that effort in conferences with the Secretary of Agriculture, and in many letters which I wrote to the Department of Agriculture.

On January 17, I introduced a bill, S. 489, to provide additional kinds of food through the Department of Agriculture's food distribution program, and to require that first consideration in food disposal programs be given to needy families in our own country. In my remarks on the Senate floor at that time, and on several occasions since, I asked that dried eggs, as well as such things as dried beans, cooking oil, potatoes, and perhaps some fresh vegetables and fruits, and possibly some meats, be distributed.

I am happy to note that the action of the Department follows almost exactly the course I have urged for nearly 6 months. That is, section 32 funds available under an existing appropriation will be utilized in order to supply additional food to needy families—just as has been done in the past for schoolchildren under the school lunch program.

It has been my contention all along, in discussions with the Secretary of Agriculture and other officials, that the Department already had authority under section 32 to provide foods in addition to those limited kinds now in Government stocks, such as cornmeal, flour, rice, and dried milk. Now that this authority has been recognized, and again used, I think it is clear that there can be justified hope that other foods may be added when market conditions warrant this action.

Of course, under the law, one purpose of the Department's action is to help stabilize and strengthen prices to egg producers. I recognize that encouraging stable markets is an essential feature of the existing authority, and point out that my bill rested on this established principle, that I did not contemplate a general welfare or relief-type program under the Department of Agriculture.

I understand that, assuming the egg market does not rise rapidly, consumer-size cans of dried eggs will move into distribution channels within 4 to 6 weeks, after weekly purchases have begun, and the eggs processed.

I say again that I consider this an important step forward in recognizing the human problems in seriously distressed areas, and the need of hungry people in our own country. I know the Secretary's action will be welcomed by thousands of families, who through no fault of their own now must depend largely on this source of food.

I call attention also to my recent statement in the Senate urging the establishment of a home-garden program for needy families. In eastern Kentucky and elsewhere, I am sure that many families, with a little encouragement and help, can do a great deal to raise their own fresh vegetables—just as was done during World War II under the victory garden program.

I wish to commend the Department for its recognition of the problem and its action in meeting human needs which still exist in our own country.

Now, Mr. President, with all the great problems we discuss in the Senate, I am sure that discussion about dried eggs, potatoes, and beans, or about home vegetable gardens, may seem to many as not involving matters of large moment. But I say that it is a matter of large moment, of importance to the thousands of families now absolutely dependent, or subsisting in large measure on food from surplus Government stocks because they are out of work.

Mr. President, I do not wish to labor this problem. However, for 6 months I have urged before the Secretary of Agriculture that, at a time when many areas of our country are enjoying the greatest prosperity they have ever known, the very fact that there is such great wealth in the country among many people, and because there is this prosperity in the land, we should have compassion on, and consideration for, the hundreds of thousands of people who do not have enough food day by day.

I consider it a large matter indeed. I am glad that I can speak for a few minutes about such things as dried eggs, potatoes, and beans. I earnestly hope that the Secretary of Agriculture and the agricultural committees of the House and Senate will take any other action needed.

I hope that within a few days we will see more and more of the surplus foods of the country channeled to the needy families in my own State and in other States, who desperately need those foods.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1555) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, I rise in support of S. 1555, the "Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959."

This bill is both nonpartisan and bipartisan. It is reasonable and fair. I am convinced that it will be an effective instrument for dealing with the problems of corruption, gangsterism, and internal union abuses which shocked the conscience of the country when they were brought to light in recent congressional investigations, including those of the Senate select committee, headed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN].

The proposed "Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959" is nonpartisan in the sense that it represents the work of experts both in and out of Congress and from the ranks of labor and industry. Although the bill would impose detailed reporting requirements on unions and would require them to conform to certain standards in connection with the imposition and maintenance of trusteeships and the election and removal of officers, the bill has the support of the principal labor organizations, particularly those affiliated with the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations. This support is not given because labor believes the bill to be a weak or ineffective measure to control internal union affairs and financial activities, but because the labor movement is as concerned as are other segments of our society in eradicating from the labor-management field those who are contributing to delinquency in labor management relations by engaging in and encouraging corrupt practices and undemocratic behavior.

Labor leaders, as well as the rank and file of the membership of labor organizations, are just as anxious that this bill be passed as is the average citizen.

On the management side, many spokesmen have expressed their opposition to the bill, claiming, on the one hand, that it imposes unfair and too rigorous reporting requirements on employers, and on the other hand, that it does not impose sufficient restrictions on unions. Nevertheless, there are many in management who support S. 1555 because they know that this bill presents the only feasible opportunity at this time to do something constructive and wholesome about the problems of corruption and other abuses in the labor and management field. I think it would be unfortunate to reject it because some people believe it is not strong enough, and run the risk of not passing a labor reform bill at all.

Senate bill 1555 is substantially the same as the Kennedy-Ives bill which the Senate passed by an overwhelming vote a year ago. Following the defeat of that bill by the House of Representatives, however, the bill's provisions were obviously carefully scrutinized to eliminate defects which had been revealed during Senate consideration last year and improve and strengthen its provisions. Following further hearings on the bill before the Labor Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, both the subcommittee and the full committee went over the bill, line by line, and again made changes to improve the bill and make its provisions more workable and effective. The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] tells us that the committee, in executive session, considered more than 150 amendments and adopted 46 of these amendments. Plainly, this bill is nonpartisan in character and is the product of expert draftsmanship and careful congressional consideration.

I want to disgress briefly to commend the committee and its staff members for the tremendous job they have done. I know how many hours of exacting work went into the measure which is before us today. I pay tribute to their ernestness and diligence.

The bill is also bipartisan as well as nonpartisan legislation. The principal sponsors of labor-management reform legislation during the last session of Congress came from both sides of the aisle, and were led on this side of the aisle by the Senator from Massachusetts, and on the other side of the aisle by former Senator Irving Ives of New York.

While the Kennedy-Ervin bill had no sponsors from the other side of the aisle as it was originally introduced, it is once again a bipartisan measure as it comes before the Senate today. In the process of consideration of the bill in committee, changes were made upon the basis of which two of our colleagues on the other side of the aisle, namely the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] and the Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS], who are members of the committee, have added their names to the list of sponsors of the proposed legislation.

I emphasize the bipartisan sponsorship of this bill because there are all too many persons who want to use it for political purposes rather than to achieve feasible and effective measures to deal with corruption and other abuses it undertakes to correct. Although it is undoubtedly true that politics brought each one of us to this body, it seems to me to be essential that we must deal with these important problems in both a nonpartisan and bipartisan fashion.

Mr. President, Senate bill 1555 was reported by a vote of 13 to 2, with minority views by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] and supplemental and individual views by Senators COOPER, JAVITS, and PROUTY. I am convinced that anyone who reads the report and these views can come to no other conclusion than that the bill avoids extremes and is fair to labor unions and their members, as well as to employers and the middlemen whom many of them employ.

The bill relies heavily on the theory that if the internal procedures and financial transactions of unions and employers and their officers and representatives are made public, union members and public opinion will compel the elimination of improper and unethical practices. In my judgment, this is a sound and constructive theory. The same principle was embodied in the Welfare and Pension Plans Disclosure Act which was enacted by the Congress last year to deal with serious problems and abuses, involving in some instances millions of dollars, which had arisen in connection with the administration of employee health, welfare, and pension plans.

Disclosures before the McClellan committee indicate that most union members and their leaders have a high sense of responsibility for the conduct of the affairs of their organizations and the expenditure of their unions' funds. They strive to avoid becoming enmeshed in conflict of interest transactions involving their unions. It is unfortunate that some union leaders have not been faithful to their trust and that legislation is needed to clean up corruption. The reporting requirements which the bill imposes on unions and their officers and employees are well adopted to expose abuses to the light of day where they can be effectively dealt with by the members.

It is also important, I think, that the Senate keep in mind that, as the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare has pointed out in its report:

> There are important sections of management that refused to recognize that the employees have a right to form and join unions without interference and to enjoy freely the right to bargain collectively with their employer concerning their wages, working conditions, and other conditions of employment. The hearings of the McClellan committee have shown that employers have often cooperated with and even aided crooks and racketeers in the labor movement at the expense of their own employees. They have employed so-called middlemen to organize no-union committees and engage in other activities to prevent union organization among their employees. They have financed community campaigns to defeat union organization. They have employed investigators and informers to report on the organizing efforts of employees and unions.

I agree wholeheartedly with the committee that it is "essential that any legislation which purports to drive corruption and improper activities out of labor-management relations should contain provisions dealing effectively with these problems." The reporting provisions of the bill which apply to employers and others acting for them are designed to bring and keep their antiunion activities in the open.

The bill's reporting requirements are supplemented by provisions assuring union members an opportunity at periodic intervals and by secret ballot to pass judgment on the conduct of their officers and to elect others to replace those who have been guilty of improper conduct.

In addition, the bill makes it a criminal offense for union officers or employees, or for employers or their middlemen, to do certain things. While bribery and extortion, shakedowns, and payoffs are already criminal offenses under the laws of most of the States, the Federal criminal penalties provided for in Senate bill 1555 will contribute important additional sanctions in support of the reporting requirements of the bill.

Some persons, many of whom are well-intentioned, believe that Senate bill 1555 is not sufficiently tough in dealing with the racketeering and wrongdoing brought to light by the McClellan committee. I am receiving mail in this vein, and I imagine that most other Senators are also.

The bill undoubtedly could be made much tougher. If all we are concerned about is the abuses which have been found in labor-management relations, perhaps the most effective way to abolish them would be to abolish labor-management relations. I do not believe, however, that any responsible person seriously contends that labor unions ought to be abolished, or that all plants and enterprises should be turned over to the employees to be run by them without any interference from the owners.

In devising legislation to deal with corruption and improper practices, the problem is to decide where the line should be drawn between conduct which ought to be permissible and conduct which ought to be prohibited. It is also imperative that the legislation deal precisely with the abuses it is designed to deal with and not with problems involving entirely different considerations.

The Committee on Labor and Public Welfare has recognized that there are problems in the field of labor-management relations which require legislative action, as well as in the field of labor and management reform. It has established a special panel of experts representing industry, labor, and the public to recommend changes in the Taft-Hartley Act which have become necessary because of developments in labor-management relations since the passage of that act. This panel will submit a report to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and presumably that committee will draft proposed legislation based on those recommendations. In these circumstances, provisions which would make substantial changes in the present relationships between management and labor have no place in Senate bill 1555. The bill is designed to deal with corruption and undemocratic practices. It is not intended to write a new balance in labor-management relations.

I think it is worth calling to the attention of the Senate the fact that although labor unions have fought long and vigorously for the repeal of State right-to-work laws or for amendment of the Taft-Hartley Act to prohibit State right-to-work laws, the AFL–CIO has not pressed for the repeal of section 14(b) of the act in this bill. This is particularly noteworthy, since in the last general election five States rejected right-to-work laws by large majorities.

As a labor-management reform bill, S. 1555 will, I am convinced, be a strong and effective weapon in curbing corruption and promoting union democracy internally. Let me list some of the criminal penalties which the bill would impose:

First. In connection with the reporting requirements applicable to unions, union officers and employees, employers and their middlemen, the bill makes it a crime to fail to make reports or file false reports or make false entries in or destroy books and records on which such reports are based

Second. The bill prohibits persons who have been convicted of certain crimes from holding union office or employment within 5 years of having served any part of a prison term as a result of such conviction.

Third. The bill prohibits unions from paying the legal fees or fines of any person indicted or convicted of a violation of the bill.

Fourth. The bill prohibits so-called "shakedown" picketing.

Fifth. The bill bans the demand and acceptance by unions or union representatives of payments from interstate truckers of improper loading or unloading fees.

Sixth. The bill makes the embezzlement of union funds a Federal crime punishable by a fine up to $10,000 or imprisonment of not more than 5 years, or both.

In addition, the bill allows members of a local union which has been placed in trusteeship to obtain court review of the propriety of continuing the trusteeship for a period of longer than 18 months. Union members may also petition the Secretary of Labor to set in motion procedures whereby the validity of a union election can be determined in appropriate court proceedings or a union officer guilty of serious misconduct can be removed from office.

These provisions, I submit, are strong, effective, and wholesome. Their enactment would represent a major attack upon the abuses brought to light by the recent investigations. It would establish the principle of democracy in unions, and set up standards of honesty and fair play. It would help put the Jimmy Hoffas in the labor movement out of business.

Before concluding, I should like to say a word about union leadership in Utah. I am proud of the type of men who are heading the labor union movement in my State. With few exceptions, they were born and bred in Utah, and are among our most substantial citizens. These men are well informed and vigorous leaders.

Mr. President, I support the committee in its request that the bill not be amended to an unrecognizable form which could not be enacted. We have here a broadly accepted, workable measure. There is every reason to believe it can be passed by both Houses. The measure is not perfect—no one contends that it is—but its enactment would be a major advance in correcting abuses in the labor-management field.

We are all aware, I am sure, that the corruption and undemocratic practices which have been brought to light in the labor movement have long beeen recognized by those within, as well as those outside, the labor movement. The AFL–CIO has placed itself on record as firmly committed to the ouster of crooks and racketeers from the labor movement.

It is my hope that Senate bill 1555 will pass the Senate in substantially the same form in which it has been reported from the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCARTHY in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, this Congress must enact legislation to prevent corruption and racketeering in the labor unions and on the part of those in management who aid and abet such practices. The abuses revealed by the McClellan committee have demonstrated conclusively that legislation in this field is long overdue. A failure to enact such legislation at this time would be a grave blow to our democratic process and to our Nation's economic well-being.

There are two distinct areas which govern the activities of labor unions and management in which Congress has both the power and the duty to act. The first of these areas is the subject of the great majority of the provisions of the bill we are now considering. It is the field of abuses in the internal affairs of unions and in certain management activities. These practices are simply the actions of corrupt labor leaders and corrupt businessmen.

The second area which Congress must regulate concerns labor-management relations covered under the Taft-Hartley Act.

If we are to be able to agree on the exact changes we should make in present law in these two areas, I feel very strongly that we must separate one of them from the other, and must attack them one at a time.

All of us are well aware of the years of frustration we have experienced in attempting to reform labor-management practices. In my 10 years of service in the Senate I have seen two major labor bills pass the Senate, only to die in the House; and I have seen President Eisenhower's recommendations for legislation in this field killed in the Senate by a motion to return the bill to committee.

Last year, the labor reform bill was actually supported by the better elements of the union movement; yet the bill failed to be enacted into law. The bill contained certain relatively minor changes in the Taft-Hartley law which were advocated by labor—modifications which had even been approved by the late Senator Taft. These amendments drew objections from employer groups, who urged Congress to kill the whole bill, rather than accept the objectionable features. The bill died in the House, after it had passed the Senate by a vote of 88 to 1.

This experience was typical of congressional failures in the labor-reform field during the 10 years that I have been a Member of this body. In view of these frustrating failures in the past to legislate effectively, I am persuaded that we shall achieve more by making a step-by-step approach, rather than by attempting to write a bill to remedy all the evils at one time.

The issue is so complex, is subject to so many ramifications and technicalities, and is subject to so much emotional prejudice and to diametrically opposed opinions, that an effort to bite off too much at one time inevitably leads to complete frustration. If we are to enact any legislation at all in this field—and I repeat that it is imperative that we do enact legislation in this field—we must do so by taking one step at a time. We must do so carefully, after great deliberation, after an opportunity for all sides to present their viewpoints, and by making a constructive approach, keeping in mind at all times the ultimate welfare of our great country.

The distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], as chairman of the Labor Subcommittee of the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee, has had a major share in the drafting of the proposed legislation now before us. He has stated that, as soon as is practicable, the Labor and Public Welfare Committee will report to the Senate proposed legislation which will correct defects in the Taft-Hartley Act. With this assurance, we can safely leave to a later date reconsideration of that proposed legislation.

As all of us know, a blue ribbon advisory panel, composed of eminent academicians, legal experts, and those with both management and union experience, is making a careful study, for the purpose of suggesting revisions to the Taft-Hartley Act. Before I would feel that I could vote with complete confidence on proposed amendments to this legislation, which for the past 12 years has been our basic law regulating labor-management relations, I would like to have a great deal of time to study the arguments, pro and con, in regard to each aspect of these matters. The floor of the U.S. Senate is not the proper place to draft such far-reaching legislation. We must have the benefit of careful study and long deliberation by the appropriate Senate committees.

For example, the question of secondary boycotts is a tremendously complicated one. Management groups, by and large, feel that the secondary boycott is, unequivocally, an evil. Unions, on the other hand, feel that without the secondary boycott, as a weapon to offset economic weapons possessed by management, they would be severely handicapped in their efforts to improve the lot of the workingman.

Fair and well-conducted committee hearings and a carefully studied committee report should clear up many of our disagreements on this subject. I would very much dislike to have a vote taken on this matter without the benefit of the safeguards inherent in our deliberative legislative processes.

The question of legislation to curb corruption and racketeering in the labor-management field has been given exhaustive study by the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee. Over 2,300 pages of testimony comprise the public hearings on this subject. The committee has spent many hours in careful deliberation, in going over the bill line by line. Although there are still in my mind questions about certain provisions of the bill, and although I plan to follow very closely the arguments presented by my colleagues in regard to proposed amendments, I am convinced that this bill is a carefully drafted piece of proposed legislation. I am convinced that it would go a long way toward correcting the sorry record of gross violations of trust witnessed by the American people in following the McClellan committee hearings.

However, it cannot be said that the same exhaustive study has been given to the question of amending the Taft-Hartley Act; and I do not feel that Congress should legislate in this field before giving the same careful consideration to any proposed changes in this law.

I much prefer to approach the subject of labor legislation through the method of thorough and comprehensive committee study. Any other approach would not fulfill our obligation to the American people.

Furthermore, any other method of attack upon these difficult problems would inevitably fail, resulting only in wasted time. As we have had in previous Congresses, again we would have what amounts to much ado about nothing.

The bill now before the Senate, while it basically confines itself to correcting improper activities in labor and management practices, such as corruption, undemocratic procedures, conflicts of interests, and unethical practices, has one section devoted to amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act. While these amendments are largely technical in nature, and most of them are fairly noncontroversial, it is my feeling that to be completely honest and to completely separate the field of improper activities from the field of the external relations between industry and labor, we must remove all Taft-Hartley amendments from this bill.

I intend to vote to strike out the Taft-Hartley amendments which are contained in title VI of this bill.

Evils arising from the internal operation of unions are entirely separate problems from those arising from union and management disagreements, and they require separate legislative consideration. The attempt to consider these separate fields in one piece of legislation would serve only to make the enactment of any legislation more difficult.

In the last Congress, the Senate passed by an almost unanimous vote a bill very similar to S. 1555. No one of the Senators now serving who was in the previous Congress voted against that bill. If the Taft-Hartley amendments are stricken from the measure, it is a bill upon which we can readily agree.

I have been urged by extremists on both sides of this question to support legislation going far beyond anything that it is possible the Congress would approve. There are a minority of union leaders who do not want any reform legislation. There are businessmen who would like to have this bill crucify the labor union movement. Many of these persons say this bill does not go far enough. They would like to have the revelations of embezzlement, fraud, illegal elections, connivance, murder, arson, and other malpractices revealed by the McClellan committee, made the basis for legislation drafted to cripple labor unions.

I say, unequivocally, that I will not support such an extreme position.

I am prepared to vote to outlaw corruption in labor and management, but I am not willing to vote for ill-considered proposals to crucify labor under the guise of reform.

The middle road between the extremists on both sides is frequently the best road for us to travel. We should seek to curb corruption and racketeering. We should seek to give the rank-and-file union member a greater opportunity to participate in his union activities and to make his voice heard in union leadership councils. We should make it tougher for crooked union officials to steal from their members.

At the same time, let us remember that the great majority of labor leaders and union members are honest, hard-working American citizens. They are no better or no worse than the rest of us. They support the effort of the Congress to oust racketeers and gangsters from positions of power and responsibility in their organizations.

Senate bill 1555 with the proposed amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act stricken from the bill, is a measure the American people should be able to support wholeheartedly and in unison.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS TO MONDAY

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate stand in recess——

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold the motion in order to permit me to ask a question?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I withhold the motion.

Mr. KUCHEL. I have just been informed that the Republican conference of Senators will be held Monday morning at 10 o'clock. Is there a possibility that the leadership might give consideration to convening at noon rather than earlier?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I was about to move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock a.m., on Monday.

If the acting minority leader will withhold his question for a moment, we shall try to consult with the majority leader. It had been the plan to take a recess until 11 a.m. on Monday. It may be possible to change the time of meeting to 12 o'clock noon. We should like to check with the majority leader first.

Of course, the acting minority leader is fully familiar with the unanimous-consent agreement relating to Monday. If the time of meeting is postponed until 12 o'clock noon, that will probably mean that the Senate will be in session a little late that evening, because, as I recall, 6 hours of general debate are provided for under the unanimous-consent agreement, after morning business is concluded.

So if the Senate meets at 12 o'clock noon and morning business is concluded by 1 o'clock, 6 hours of debate will bring us up to 7 o'clock, at the very minimum, in the absence of quorum calls and other delays.

Mr. President, I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess until Monday, April 20, 1959, at 12 o'clock meridian.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Address by Hon. Estes Kefauver, of Tennessee, Before the National Independent Dairy Association

OF
HON. ESTES KEFAUVER
OF TENNESSEE
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, April 17, 1959

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a speech which I delivered last Tuesday before the National Independent Dairy Association, at its meeting in Washington, D.C.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF SENATOR ESTES KEFAUVER, DEMOCRAT, OF TENNESSEE, BEFORE NATIONAL INDEPENDENT DAIRY ASSOCIATION, WASHINGTON, D.C., APRIL 14, 1959

In asking me to come here today and talk to you, Mr. Daniel, your executive secretary and general counsel, told me that the meeting would mark the second birthday of the National Independent Dairy Association. I eagerly accepted because, as I told him, I had always liked lusty and growing youngsters and that I had also always liked birthday parties.

Mr. Daniel is an old friend of mine. He is a native Tennessean, an excellent lawyer, and well qualified by education and experience to serve you. He is a real fighter, and small businessmen need real fighters.

I want to congratulate all of you on the magnificent progress you have made in such a short time. It speaks volumes for the management of independent dairies, for their objectives, and for their leaders. In the true spirit of the occasion, I most sincerely wish for you many happy returns of the day.

That this day will return most happily many, many times seems almost certain. Small businessmen in your industry, as in others, need to speak with the full power of all of their voices. You are that voice. That voice must speak not only with power but also with knowledge, with dignity, and with the public interest as a guide. Your voice has spoken in such a way. Continue as you have begun, and the years will not only add to your age but also to the respect in which you are held.

The unfair methods of competition and monopolistic practices prevalent in your industry, which you so diligently strive to remove, are fairly representative of those which continue to undermine the structure of the competitive system generally.

Such methods and practices, both as they prevail in your industry and in industry generally are, therefore, the concern of the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly, of which I have the honor of being chairman.

This subcommittee operates under a Senate resolution which authorizes it "to make a complete, comprehensive, and continuing study and investigation of the antitrust and antimonopoly laws of the United States and their administration, interpretation, operation, enforcement, and effect, and to determine and from time to time redetermine the nature and extent of any legislation which may be necessary or desirable for (1) clarification of existing law to eliminate conflicts and uncertainties where necessary; (2) improvement of the administration and enforcement of existing laws; (3) supplementation of existing law to provide any additional substantive, procedural, or organizational legislation which may be needed for the attainment of the fundamental objects of the laws and the efficient administration and enforcement thereof."

It was under this charter that in March 1958 the Antitrust Subcommittee made an investigation of milk marketing by the Adams Dairies in Missouri, Illinois, and Kentucky. The results of that investigation are contained in a report of the subcommittee dated November 15, 1958, entitled "Case Study of Incipient Monopoly in Milk Distribution."

The Adams companies sell milk to Safeway Stores, Inc., the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co., and Kroger Co., and in concert with these three great chain organizations, Adams worked in various communities to capture the market.

The five main characteristics which made the Adams scheme of operation profitable to the two dairy companies and which were ardently supported by the chains were listed as follows:

1. An enforced differential between home delivery and chainstore sale.
2. A guaranteed markup to the chains.
3. The use of promotions to reduce the price.
4. The preference given to Adams by chains in display space and promotions.
5. Promotional allowances given to the chains.

The effect of these practices was to relegate the local dairies to supplying the ever-diminishing home delivery market and serving as secondary suppliers to those retailers which still suffered them.

The subcommittee noted that the effects of the Adams program "may have been to restrain trade or tend to monopoly and should be considered in the light of the Sherman Act, the Federal Trade Commission Act, and the Clayton Act, as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act."

Regarding the Sherman Act, the subcommittee stated that the evidence leaves the impression that Adams and the chains, acting in concert, used their position to impose on local markets by such area price discriminations a price structure injurious to competition and affording a continuing market advantage over others. In this connection, the applicability of section 5 of the Federal Trade Commission Act should also be considered as well as the Clayton Act because of price discriminations and payments for promotional service involved in the Adams operations.

Stating that the record was being sent to both the Federal Trade Commission and the Department of Justice, the report concluded that a failure by these agencies to find any violation of existing laws would suggest that such laws are ineffective. Neither agency has yet reported that it has found any violation.

I am satisfied that many small businessmen, including some of you, are convinced that existing antitrust laws are inadequate both from the point of view of their coverage or interpretation and of their enforcement. The Antitrust Subcommittee is trying to do something about both of these aspects of the problem. As an example, I should like to tell you briefly what it is trying to do about price discriminations, one of the monopolistic practices present in the Adams case and which I know you are trying to destroy.

I refer, of course, to S. 11 which I introduced in the 84th and 85th Congresses and which I have again introduced in this, the 86th Congress, on behalf of myself and several colleagues.

This bill would amend the Robinson-Patman Act, enacted in 1936 to amend section 2 of the Clayton Antitrust Act which became law in 1914. In each of these three Congresses Representative WRIGHT PATMAN, of Texas, coauthor of the Robinson-Patman Act and a lifelong friend of small business, introduced a similar bill (H.R. 11) in the House of Representatives. By a special provision in the bill the existing law applicable to freight absorption is not altered or affected.

Briefly, the bill would change the statute as interpreted by the Supreme Court by providing that meeting in good faith the equally low price of a competitor is not a defense to price discriminations which are affirmatively proved by the Government to have the probable effect in any line of commerce of substantially lessening competition or tending to create a monopoly. Such meeting of a competitor's price would, however, continue to be an absolute defense to any price discrimination which was proved to have only the probable effect of injuring competition among competitors. The basic thought underlying the bill is that price discriminations which substantially lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly are as detrimental to the public interest when accomplished in good faith as they are when done in bad faith.

The problem of price discrimination is not new, but on the contrary is quite old. In economic theory and in observed business conduct, price discrimination is evidence of the existence and exercise of some degree of monopoly power. Prohibition of price discrimination in rate making was one of the necessary basic provisions of the first railroad regulatory statutes in 1887. Price discrimination was also a favorite weapon of the early trusts at which the Sherman Antitrust Act of 1890 was directed. The Sherman Act only became operative, however, when monopoly had been attained, and for that reason in 1914 Congress passed the Clayton Act, in section 2 of which it was sought to outlaw price discrimination before its anticompetitive effects were so serious as to bring the practice within the Sherman Act.

Section 2 of the Clayton Act prohibited discriminations in price in interstate sales of like goods where the probable effect in any line of commerce was (1) substantially to lessen competition, or (2) to tend to create a monopoly. The same section, however, provided that certain price discriminations were not prohibited and among them were these made in good faith to meet competition and those on account of differences in quantity.

Efforts of the Federal Trade Commission to enforce section 2 of the Clayton Act turned out to be almost wholly ineffectual. One difficulty was that price discriminations which hurt only one or a few competing purchasers were held not to threaten substantial lessening of competition in a line of commerce. A second was that any difference in quantity was held to justify any difference in price even though there was no corresponding difference in the seller's costs. Finally, and of paramount importance, meeting of competition in good faith was so broadly interpreted as to be readily demonstrable, with the result that the exemption it provided was virtually as broad as the prohibition.

With an antiprice discrimination statute full of loopholes, the practice of price discrimination thrived as did its beneficiaries. Investigations by both the Federal Trade Commission and congressional committees showed, for example, that large chains not only paid prices materially lower than their small retail competitors but sometimes even lower than wholesalers. As a result the giant retailers prospered at the expense of their smaller rivals to the extent that during a relatively few years their sales increased from less than 2 percent to more than 25 percent of total retail sales.

The public interest demanded that something be done, and in response Congress in 1936 enacted the Robinson-Patman amendment to eliminate the defects in the antiprice discrimination section of the Clayton Act. The amended statute retained, of course, the prohibition of price discriminations where the effect in any line of commerce may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly, but it went further and also condemned price discriminations where the effect may be to injure competition with the seller, or the favored buyer, or the customers of either of them. Thus the law was amended so that individual competitors as component elements of a line of commerce were protected as well as the line of commerce itself. The old provision which wholly exempted discriminations on account of quantity was changed so as to permit differentials on account of quantity to the extent of the actual savings in cost to the seller. In this manner efficiency properly became the basis of quantity differentials.

Most importantly relevant to this discussion, section 2 of the Clayton Act as amended by the Robinson-Patman Act no longer exempted discriminations in price made in good faith to meet competition. The amendment introduced a new subsection 2(b) which provided that the seller could show that his lower price was made in good faith to meet the equally low price of a competitor merely for the purpose of rebutting the preliminary or prima facie case made against the seller by the Commission.

The meaning and effect of this change with respect to meeting competition is made clear by its legislative history. The Robinson-Patman Act was the product of a conference committee of the Senate and the House which reconciled the differences between the Robinson bill as passed by the Senate and the Patman bill as passed by the House. When introduced, neither of these bills even made any reference to meeting competition, but as passed by the Senate the Robinson bill contained the old exemption, and as passed by the House the Patman bill contained a section similar to the one finally adopted. In conference, the old exemption in the Senate bill was rejected, and the House version was approved in the language in which it was finally enacted. Referring to the old exemption incorporated in the Senate bill, the report of the House conferees stated:

"This language is found in existing law, and in the opinion of the conferees is one of the obstacles to enforcement of the present Clayton Act. The Senate receded and the language is stricken. A provision relating to the question of meeting competition, intended to operate only as a rule of evidence in a proceeding before the Federal Trade Commission, is included in subsection (b)."

Referring to the new language, a report submitted by the chairman of the House conferees stated:

"It is to be noted, however, that this does not set up meeting of competition as an absolute bar to a charge of discrimination under the bill. It merely permits it to be shown in evidence. This provision is entirely procedural. It does not determine substantive rights, liabilities, and duties. They are fixed in the other provisions of the bill. * * * If this proviso were construed to permit the showing of a competing offer as an absolute bar to liability for discrimination, then it would nullify the act entirely at the very inception of its enforcement."

In 1945 the Supreme Court in the well-known Staley case had its first opportunity to interpret the meeting-competition proviso of the Robinson-Patman Act. In that case the Court affirmed a decision of the Federal Trade Commission which rejected the defense of meeting competition, and in doing so seemed quite clearly to indicate that the amendment had secured the results which Congress intended. This is the language the Court used:

"It will be noted that the defense that the pricing discriminations were made in order to meet competition is, under the statute, a matter of rebutting 'the Commission's prima facie case.' Prior to the Robinson-Patman amendments, section 2 of the Clayton Act provided that nothing contained in it 'shall prevent' discriminations in price 'made in good faith to meet competition.' The change in language of this exception was for the purpose of making the defense a matter of evidence in each case, raising a question of fact as to whether the competition justified the discrimination."

Despite this encouraging development in 1945, the law with respect to meeting competition as a defense to price discrimination is now back where it was prior to the enactment of the Robinson-Patman Act. For in 1951 the Supreme Court held in the Standard of Indiana case that the Federal Trade Commission was wrong in rejecting Standard's defense of meeting competition even where it had been shown that the discriminations had a substantially adverse competitive effect among distributors. Once again, then, meeting competition became an absolute defense to discriminations in price regardless of the magnitude of their anticompetitive effects among retailers and wholesalers. Moreover, the doctrine of the Standard of Indiana case seems to have been extended in subsequent decisions by lower Federal courts to the extent that it now appears likely that even the limitations indicated by the Supreme Court are of little if any substance.

As a result of these decisions, the Robinson-Patman Act has been seriously weakened. It now affords no real protection to competition at the wholesaler or retailer levels. The public interest in protecting competition at all levels has been subordinated to the individual manufacturer's or seller's private interest. The act has become largely a declaration of the right of sellers to discriminate in price to accommodate large buyers even though the injury to small buyers is so serious that competition in their line of commerce may be substantially lessened.

The public interest again demands that something be done to repair the damage. S. 11 is a moderate effort to do just that. The bill restricts but does not eliminate the availability of the defense of meeting in good faith the equally low price of a competitor. Where it is shown that the discriminations may merely injure competition between individual competitors, the defense continues to be absolute. Where, however, it is shown that the discriminations are so serious that their effect in any line of commerce may be substantially to lessen competition or tend to create a monopoly, the defense is eliminated.

Hence, if S. 11 becomes law a seller who finds it desirable to lower his price to one customer in order to meet in good faith the equally low price of a competitor may not have to lower his price to all competing customers or even to any of them in order to avoid an unlawful price discrimination. It is enough that he lower his price only to the extent necessary to prevent substantial lessening of competition or tendency to create a monopoly and not to the extent necessary to prevent injury to competition. The significance of this difference is that, under the bill, such a seller would not be obliged to lower his price to a customer like the one who sought damages from his supplier in a recent case. In that case the court held that the small discrimination complained of could not have substantially lessened competition or tended to create a monopoly, as was alleged, but at most could only have injured competition between the complaining customers and his competitors, as was not alleged.

S. 11 should be especially welcomed by manufacturers who see a threat to themselves in the establishment and growth of large and powerful buyers. Without the bill, suppliers, under the guise of meeting competition, will continue to vie with each other to satisfy the voracious and insatiable demands of large buyers for preferential prices. This implies not only the sacrifice of the many small buyers but the suppliers dependence upon the few mass buyers.

Much has been said both by and on behalf of management about the difficulties of making decisions to comply with S. 11. I am confident that any such difficulties have been magnified by posing hypothetical situations which include imaginary horrors. True, S. 11 does not define with mathematical precision the white area in which meeting competition is a defense and the black area in which it is not, for precision of that kind is not possible in a moderate approach. It can exist only where there is either complete prohibition or unrestrained permission.

Being moderate in its approach, S. 11 naturally contains a small gray area where the white meets the black. To businessmen who are heedless, if there are any, this gray area will present no problem—they will view it as white and assume unnecessary risks. To businessmen who are timid, if there are any, this gray area will likewise present no problem—they will see it as black and accept needless restrictions. To businessmen who are prudent, as if there are any who are not, the shaded area will also present no problem—in the light of the facts in each case they will see a line running through it which will be drawn by their willingness to resolve any doubt by what they know to be the public interest. Just as it is easy to distinguish between being stumbled over and being kicked, so it should not be difficult to differentiate a price discrimination which may economically maim the many small merchants from one which will clearly fall short of having that result.

In the 84th Congress the measure passed the House by a vote of 393 to 3 but was not considered by the Senate because it was caught in the rush of the closing days of the session when unanimous consent was required to bring it up.

In the 85th Congress the bill was reported to the Senate in modified form, but the Senate adjourned without having taken any action.

In the present Congress hearings have again been held on the bill, and the record is being prepared for the printer. We were fortunate in having your counsel, Mr. Daniel, testify on your behalf at these hearings in favor of the bill. The support of this organization was indeed welcome, and your position was forcibly presented by Mr. Daniel.

Above all else, we must not get discouraged in this battle for the preservation of our free competitive system, for it surely will be a never-ending one. With your help and support, and the assistance of all of the other good people in all industries and in all parts of the country, much can be accomplished.

Thank you for being so kind as to let me be your guest.

Federal Aid to Education

OF
HON. JAMES E. MURRAY
OF MONTANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, April 17, 1959

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, on Monday, April 13, my distinguished colleague, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH], appeared before the Subcommittee on Education of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, of which I have the privilege of serving as chairman. Although I was unable to be present at that session, I have had the opportunity to read his statement; and I believe it is one of the best and most eloquent arguments for Federal aid to education which has been presented.

I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the Senator's statement be printed in the RECORD, so that all my colleagues will have the opportunity to read it. I congratulate my colleague from West Virginia on the cogency and eloquence of his presentation.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SENATOR JENNINGS RANDOLPH, DEMOCRAT, OF WEST VIRGINIA, BEFORE SUBCOMMITTEE ON EDUCATION, UNITED STATES SENATE COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE, ON S. 2, A BILL TO PROVIDE FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE FOR THE SUPPORT OF PUBLIC SCHOOLS BY APPROPRIATING FUNDS TO THE STATES TO BE USED FOR CONSTRUCTING SCHOOL FACILITIES AND FOR TEACHERS' SALARIES

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate this opportunity to come before you and your subcommittee to testify on the school support bill. You are to be commended, sir, for your persistent and devoted efforts in introducing this measure, and I am pleased to have been one of its early cosponsors.

Before discussing the evidence which substantiates the critical need for this legislation, I would like, Mr. Chairman, to address my comment to a point which has been raised by its opponents.

I refer to the often-voiced fear of Federal control, which follows inevitably—it is supposed—upon Federal aid to education. We are all aware of the importance of the American custom of local responsibility and control of public education. But let us at least be clear in our understanding of the origins and the reasons for this tradition. Let us not be confused by the invocations of the rhetoric of the Founding Fathers, or raising the spectre of an omnivorous and power-hungry Federal police state.

Without going into historical detail we can acknowledge that the practice of local support for public education has been one of the fundamental marks of the American system from its outset. But let us also acknowledge that this practice was not based upon any hallowed principle of democratic idealism, but rather on the simple and understandable resistance of the citizens of one community to paying taxes for the education of the children of another.

The struggle for universal public education in America was not won overnight. The merchant and propertied classes resisted strongly the economic, political, and social ferment we associate with the Jacksonian period, and the chief tribute they won from the champions of public education was the principle of local support of the schools. The principle was thus motivated by self-interest as well as idealism.

But this is not to condemn it. Within the context of an agrarian society, a loose Federal structure, and the sectional jealousies and rivalries of the individual States, such a point of view is easily understandable. But, Mr. Chairman, it is important, when we listen today to the critics of Federal aid to public schools invoke some supposedly time-honored American tradition, to know that that tradition has nothing to do with the fear of Federal control.

On the contrary, in the field of higher education the practice of Federal support is almost as old as our tax-supported universities themselves. Three years from now the great land-grant colleges and universities of America will celebrate the centennial of the Morrill Act, which set aside Federal lands for the support of agricultural and engineering colleges. In 1862 Congress passed this epoch-making act, which for the first time established the policy of Federal aid, not only to the newer States but to the older ones as well—offering each State the proceeds from the sale of 30,000 acres of Federal land for each Member of its congressional delegation. The sole measure of Federal control in these colleges has been the supervision of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps established therein—hardly an example of a burgeoning police power of the national state.

In recent decades the Federal Government has entered the field of education in a variety of ways—the public schools built by the WPA in the 1930's, the tuition-payment program of the GI bill, and the grants-in-aid and the underwriting of research programs at many of our colleges and universities—in none of these has the Federal Government encroached upon the control of local authorities.

The threat of Federal control, Mr. Chairman, is a myth, and the fear of it is spun from fantasy and a misreading of our history.

The question, therefore, is not whether or not we shall have Federal control—but whether we shall have Federal aid—and if so, how much, what direction it will take, and how best to utilize it in a coherent manner to lift our public school system to the level that a thriving democracy demands and one that our young people deserve.

Senate bill 2 offers a significant contribution in alleviating two of the most critical problems in the educational scene—the inadequacy of teachers' salaries and the shortage of classroom space.

Let me refer first to the long-range problem of the shortage of classroom space. The figure of 142,000—reperesenting our present classroom shortage—has been repeated so frequently in recent discussions that we are likely to overlook the more enduring features of our problem.

For example, from 1780 to 1955 our population grew from 40 million to 165 million. During this same period, while our general population increased 4 times, our public school population increased approximately 80 times.

Under our present rate of population development the bulge of the future will press even more heavily on our already burdened facilities. The elementary school enrollment of 22 million of last year will rise to about 34 million by 1960–61. By 1969 our high schools will be flooded with 50 to 70 percent more students than they can now handle. By 1975 our colleges and universities will face a doubling and in some cases a tripling of enrollment. Now these are only the bare bones of statistics that comprise one aspect of the problem. There are others.

For one, there is the problem borne of the mobility of our society. We are a people on the go—34 million of us change our address every year, and there are long-term currents of movement to the North and West. Thus, the effects of education offered in a given school may be registered in a State far removed from where the education was acquired.

The quality of education in the United States is therefore a national issue, rather than a merely local one. And yet it is the only national problem that we have not attempted to solve on a national basis.

Let us turn now to a consideration of the shortage and recruitment of teachers. It is authoritatively estimated that in order to maintain the present student-teacher ratio, between one-third and one-half of all 4-year college graduates would have to enter school teaching in the next decade. Since only one out of five college graduates customarily enters school teaching, one can appreciate the magnitude of the problem involved.

Not only is the number of teachers inadequate, but the preparation of many of the present teachers is in need of improvement. According to the National Education Association, 33 precent of our elementary schoolteachers do not hold A.B. degrees, and more than 21 percent of all public schoolteachers have less than 4 years of college. A similar condition prevails, according to the NEA, at the college and university level, with the holders of doctor's degrees among full-time teachers having decreased by 25 percent since 1953–54.

The reasons are apparent: business industry, and government are out-bidding the teaching profession for the talents of many of its best qualified and most able men and women. Nor is it small wonder, when one observes that the average State salary of classroom teachers ranges from a high of $6,400 to a low of $3,070 per year. While in my own State of West Virginia the beginning salary for a teacher with a master's degree is $3,060.

Now admittedly, we cannot reward, and I do not believe the American teacher expects to be rewarded, with the chauffeur and summer homes that we are told some of his and her Russian counterparts have at present. But we can and we must reward our teachers with salaries more consistent with their professional status and their dedication of purpose. The necessity for many of our teachers to have part-time supplementary jobs is, to put it in its mildest terms, inconsistent with the responsibility that a democratic society has placed upon them. Our teachers' salaries can and must be raised immediately and substantially if we are to attract able young men and women and retain those we have.

According to the Rockefeller Report, we spent, in 1955, a total of just under $14 billion for public and private education at all levels—slightly more than we spent last year on alcohol and cosmetics. Against a gross national product of $391 billion for that year our expenditures for formal education amounted to 3.6 percent. The same source estimates that by 1967 the increased demands that I referred to earlier will require an expenditure of $30 billion, or 5 percent of an estimated gross national product of $600 billion.

Such a sharp rise in expenditures calls for a determined departure from traditional methods of school financing. Historically, Americans have preferred to finance their schools at the local and State levels. But there has already been a shift of responsibility from the local and to the State level. In 1930 under 17 percent of the cost was borne by the State. In 1954 this had more than doubled to over 37 percent.

However, local and State tax systems in many instances are not adequate to the tasks, partly because they depend so heavily on the real property tax—where everywhere lags behind rising incomes and the increased cost of education, and partly because local and State governments are reluctant to raise taxes and thereby place their communities in an unfavorable competitive position with other States.

The problem is especially acute in such a State as West Virginia and some of the Southern States where great inequalities exist in the income of different school districts. And the same condition exists on a higher level in terms of the difference between the States in per capita income and the relative proportion of the tax dollar spent on education.

West Virginia, for example, with a per capita income in 1957 of only $1,480, was spending $218 a year for every child in school. From the total State revenues of $285,996,653 the school received over 36 percent, leaving less than two thirds of every tax dollar for all the other State governmental services combined. Thus, if we were to try to match the per capita dollar expenditures of such States as New York or California we would more than exhaust our total revenue on schools alone.

According to figures compiled by the National Education Association, the average per pupil expenditure among the individual States ranges from a high of $535 a year to a low of $164, with a national average of $340 per pupil.

This gross disparity in expenditure between our richest and our poorest States can be rectified only with Federal aid. For, to illustrate again by reference to my own State of West Virginia—even with proposed new tax levies and a statewide reappraisal of property, our school revenue per pupil would still be more than $60 below the national average and approximately $175 below that of New York State. Mr. Chairman, I reiterate, these inequities can be redressed only with Federal assistance. Let us not be deluded by the ideas of a century ago—ideas which at that time had some validity. For we are no longer a loose federation of quasi-independent States. We are a Nation of highly mobile people, a Nation in which the welfare of one section is inextricably involved with that of all. And as a Nation we have only one future—a future that will in substantial measure be determined by the degree of our devotion to the cause of strengthening our system of public education.

None of us is so naive as to believe that money alone will solve a deep-seated and pervasive cultural problem such as this. But the extent to which we will apply our financial resources is in part a measure of our purpose in other respects as well.

It is not encouraging, therefore, to note that we spend almost as much on alcohol and cosmetics and more than twice as much on advertising as we do on education.

Such a disparity would indicate that as a society we are in need of fundamental and soul-searching reevaluation of our aims and values. And it is one of the sadder ironies of our time that this reexamination of education in a democracy has gained national support largely because of the educational achievements of a police state. As Dr. Robert Hutchins recently stated:

"History will smile sardonically at the spectacle of this great country getting interested, slightly and temporarily, in education only because of the technical achievements of Russia, and then being able to act as a nation by assimilating education to the cold war and calling an education bill a defense act.

"We might as well make up our minds to it. If our hopes of democracy are to be realized, every citizen of this country is going to have to be educated to the limit of his capacity. And I don't mean trained, amused, exercised, accommodated, or adjusted. I mean that his intellectual power must be developed."

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I would suggest—in keeping with the tenor of Dr. Hutchins' remarks—that we approach our duty here, not in the spirit of a cold war with Russia, but in the spirit of fulfilling our own destiny as a democracy.

This means that the fundamental issue in education as in government today is no less than the assessment of the basic values of a democratic society. The making of the image of what we want to be, the determination of the kind of greatness we hope to achieve—these are the choices that confront us now.

The kind of greatness that we produce in the years ahead will be nurtured by the values that we as a society cherish and transmit, in large measure, through our formal education system. And if we fail now, Mr. Chairman, to supply the means for the best system possible our children and grandchildren will have little cause to be grateful to us.

At the foundation of our values is the principle which more than any other distinguishes American culture from the older cultures of Europe and from the new totalitarian societies; that is, the extent to which we are guided by our faith in the dignity and integrity of the individual. This is the faith which states that man should live in the light of reason, be free to exercise his own moral choice, and develop to the full the latent possibilities within him.

As this faith is translated into the practical problems of our school system it presents a double-barreled challenge—the challenge of maintaining equality of opportunity for all while, at the same time, stressing the achievement of excellence for those capable of it. The challenge is to maintain both quantity and quality in education—to expand the one and improve the other.

Many people of late—laymen as well as professional educators—have posed the problem in terms of a choice between quantity and quality, a choice between equality and excellence.

I say that we have no choice. We must, if we would survive, have both.

We must have a generally informed citizenry capable of making intelligent decisions on matters of the public good. And we must have the highly trained specialists as well as the men and women of broad-gage learning that our modern, complex society demands. This is the chief problem in the field of education before us.

The early and unanimous endorsement of S. 2 by this subcommittee, Mr. Chairman, will help significantly in providing the means to solve this problem. We must have an educational program to match our times.

A Long Look at China

OF

HON. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, April 17, 1959

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, there is a great deal of concern in this country about the Communist economic offensive. Sometimes we think of Communist economic power exclusively in terms of the Soviet Union. Any calculations which leave out the tremendous actual and potential economic power of Red China are misleading and can be dangerous.

This point is well brought out in an excellent article by Representative CHESTER BOWLES, entitled "A Long Look at China," which appeared in the April 4, 1959, issue of the Saturday Evening Post.

I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A LONG LOOK AT CHINA

(By CHESTER BOWLES)

"China—there lies a sleeping giant. Let him sleep for when he wakes he shall shake the world."—Napoleon Bonaparte.

On April 20, 1958, in the province of Hunan, the Communist Chinese Government launched the world's first effort to establish pure communism on a nationwide scale.

The commune that was established there was to be the first of many similar organizations which would harness the energies of every man, woman, and child in rural China to the total service of the state.

It was named Weihsing, the Chinese word for sputnik, and Mao Tse-tung, chairman of the Chinese People's Republic, confidently stated that it carried potentialities for tomorrow's world as explosive as the Soviet thrust into outer space.

Four months later, on August 6, Radio Peiping announced that the first stage of this extraordinary program had been completed. More than 500 million individuals belonging to 120 million households and representing 99 percent of the population of rural China had been organized into 26,000 communes.

"The attainment of communism in China," the announcement triumphantly concluded "is no longer a remote future event."

But in China, as elsewhere, old ways die slowly. On December 18, Radio Peking admitted that orders had been given to slow down the pace of rural regimentation. A breathing spell was needed, it was said, so that "alien class elements" could be purged, "skeptics and doubters" convinced, and local party leaders rid of their tendency to see "only things, not men."

The announcement added that Mao Tse-tung had asked to be freed from his post of national chairman so that he could "concentrate his energies on dealing with the direction of policy" and devote more time to his writings on Communist theory. His request had been granted. Mao would, of course, continue in his key post as head of the Chinese Communist Party.

This succession of announcements set off a whirl of speculation in the world capitals. Belgrade wondered if Mao's resignation might be due to differences with Khrushchev. New Delhi hoped that the slowdown in rural regimentation might indicate a new moderation in Peking. Nationalist leaders in Taipei even suggested that civil war on the mainland might be in the offing.

But those who study Chinese Communist economic and political policy most objectively were inclined to dismiss such explanations as products of wishful thinking. In their view the two central questions posed by recent swings of the political pendulum inside China go far deeper:

1. Can Communist economics, which forged Russia into a modern industrial state in two generations, succeed in Asia, or do the totally different conditions which exist there doom Asian communism to failure?

2. Whether or not this program succeeds, what role is the "New China" likely to play in our future and Asia's?

These questions deserve urgent and thoughtful consideration by American policy makers of both parties. On their answers may depend in large measure the nature of tomorrow's world.

The one-fourth of mankind who live in China are among the toughest, hardest-working people on earth. By the time this year's American high-school graduates reach their thirtieth birthdays, China's population will have soared to 900 million men, women, and children.

Since the 1920's, most Americans have tended consistently to misjudge the strength, competence, and durability of the Chinese Communist leaders who now rule this vast expanse of land and people, an error which may be explained by our bitter disapproval of their policies.

In the first years following Chiang Kai-shek's retreat to Formosa in 1949 we looked on the new government in Peking as no more and no less than one more backward satellite of the Soviet Union.

When Red China began to emerge as a world force in its own right, our official pronouncements patronizingly promoted its government to the rank of junior partner in the Communist hierarchy.

Recently some American observers have veered to the other extreme. When reports indicated that it was Mao's influence, in 1958, that caused Nikita Khrushchev to take a tougher position in foreign affairs, they insisted that here was proof positive that the Chinese tail was now wagging the Soviet dog.

The actual relationship between Moscow and Peking remains obscure. We can assume that the balance of influence between the two is in flux, with each partner forced in various ways to accommodate itself somewhat to the ambitions and fears of the other.

But here is the important point: Moscow and Peking view our fast-changing world from rather different perspectives, and these differences may grow.

The men in the Kremlin rule a nation blessed with plenty of living space, plenty of natural as well as human resources and—they think—plenty of time.

Their military might, industrial power, and political influence have been growing with spectacular speed. They assume that Soviet power plus Communist ideology will ultimately add up to world domination.

Their task, as they see it, is to ride and exploit the revolutionary wave which they believe constitutes the future. They have Lenin's assurance that history is on their side, and they can see no reason to take chances.

In contrast, the Chinese Communists face appalling problems, which are now testing their political and economic theories under the most difficult conceivable conditions.

If the Peking government goes through with its present plan for rapid industrialization on the Soviet model, it may place an impossible burden on the rural Chinese economy, which must feed 650 million people and provide surplus agricultural products to help pay for critically needed imports.

If it seeks to encourage increased food production by appeasing the peasants, it will almost certainly be forced to abandon its Communist political objectives.

This, in a nutshell, is Peking's ultimate dilemma.

The system of pulling a whole nation up by its bootstraps, which worked in Russia at such heavy cost, may fail in China because the conditions there are almost totally different. The most important of these differences relate to land, food, and people.

The Soviet Union sprawls for nearly 10,000 miles across two continents. Like our American West, the vast, rich expanse beyond the Urals was opened up only in the last 200 years. It is still largely underdeveloped.

Before the coming of the Communists the Russian people had rarely known hunger. Indeed, before the outbreak of World War I Czarist Russia exported some 10 million tons of wheat each year.

Yet, even with this massive, built-in agricultural advantage, the Soviet experiment nearly collapsed during the 1930's for lack of food. If we are to understand the problems now facing the Communist regime in China, we must understand the reasons for this narrowly averted disaster.

During his early struggle for full control of the Kremlin, Stalin continued Lenin's relatively benevolent policies toward the peasants. With total political power securely in his hands, Stalin then turned to the speedy industrialization of the Soviet Union. This, he saw, would require the diversion of enormous quantities of food to the cities to feed the growing industrial population.

In a non-Communist country as potentially rich as Russia, this extra food production could be secured by offering the incentive of higher prices for agricultural produce and a corresponding improvement in rural living standards. But Stalin knew that he could not offer the Russian peasants this special measure of economic freedom without undermining the iron political discipline demanded by the revolution.

He responded to this dilemma with characteristic ruthlessness. Boldly scrapping Lenin's promises of independent land ownership and increasing opportunity for each peasant family, Stalin moved to mobilize all of rural Russia along tightly regimented political lines.

By the late 1930's almost every peasant family in Russia had been pressed into collective farms. All farm machinery was pooled. The number of dairy and meat animals was drastically reduced to save more grain for human consumption. Tightly administered controls forced the shipment of more and more agricultural produce to the cities. Although total farm production declined, the percentage reaching the industrial workers increased.

The short-term result of Stalin's rural program was an eruption into violence and repression without precedent in human history. The peasants resisted and were brutally crushed. Apparently reliable reports indicated that nearly 10 million died and millions more were shipped to Siberia. In a land with an unlimited agricultural potential, food production dwindled and the already meager living standards dropped abruptly.

For more than 20 years the Russian peasants were badgered and terrorized to increase their production. By setting low prices on agricultural products at the farm and charging high prices in the government-owned retail stores, huge profits were extracted from the peasants to produce more and still more capital for the rapid growth of industry.

Only a very small investment was made in rural development, and consumer goods were almost nonexistent. The Soviet Union lived precariously on its built-in food surplus, created not by communism but by nature.

In long-term results, however, this fantastic gamble paid off. Although the cost in human misery was staggering, Stalin's determination and the limitless potential of the Russian land enabled the Soviet Government to create a powerful industrial state in less than two generations.

Since World War II the annual rate of Soviet economic growth has been double our own. Only now, after 30 years of ruthless exploitation, are the first economic benefits beginning to trickle down to the patient Soviet peasants whose forced sacrifices made industrialization possible.

Now it is this Stalinist program that the Peking Government adopted as a blueprint for China's development. In doing so, under the infinitely more difficult Chinese conditions, it embarked on what is by all odds the most daring economic and political gamble of all time.

Mao, like Lenin, had based his revolution on the most dramatic promise that can be offered to any peasant people: "Down with the landlords. Land to the tiller." But when the time was ripe, Mao, like Stalin, did not hesitate to repudiate this promise and to press China's peasants into an economic and political system that had no place for private land ownership.

In 1954, after long, careful preparation, a program of complete rural collectivization was announced. By 1957 practically all Chinese rural families had been organized into 740,000 collectives.

Then, in 1958, Mao, as we have seen, went one giant step further. Henceforth all farm collectives, rural industry and local militia would be consolidated into communes. This was a step so breathtakingly radical and ruthless that even Stalin had not dared to attempt it.

The objective was the total mobilization of 500 million villagers into a massive human work force, the destruction of the family as a social unit and the substitution of a new disciplined loyalty to the Communist state.

Every able-bodied man and woman worker was assigned to the fields, to irrigation projects, to the small decentralized factories and blast furnaces. The organization was along military lines so that work squads, platoons, companies and battalions could be transformed overnight into military cadres.

Every hour of each individual's day was rigidly supervised. Children were to be brought up in common nurseries, workers fed in great central messhalls and the old and infirm assigned to what are described as "happiness homes."

Previous to its December 18 announcement of a slowdown in the organization of this fantastic program, the Peking Government had credited it with huge increases in agricultural production and rural development.

The 1958 cotton crop and the early rice crop are said to be double that of 1957. The wheat crop is up 67 percent. Hundreds of thousands of work teams laboring from dawn to dusk were reported to have opened up 69 million acres to new irrigation. This is fifty times the irrigated areas of America's biggest river project, Grand Coulee, and six times that of India's spectacular Bhakra-Nangal on the Sutlej River in the Punjab.

This, boasted Peking, is only the beginning of an irrigation program that will set the stage for further enormous increases in agricultural production in the next few years. Next on the development agenda is the harnessing of the wild, wasted waters of the Yangtze itself.

To what extent can we separate fact from propaganda? Does the December 18 announcement indicate that the system of tightly organized communes will be abandoned? Or does it suggest no more than a cautious pause for breath-catching in the "great leap forward" toward the total regimentation of Chinese society?

No one can doubt that the 10,000-word announcement, which took 4 hours and 10 minutes to read over Radio Peking, indicates formidable opposition among China's 500,000,000 villagers.

Although it was stoutly maintained that there is to be no reversal in the program itself, some wage incentives were admitted to be necessary to encourage "labor enthusiasm." Fears that all private property was to be immediately surrendered must, it was said, be dispelled.

Every worker should be assured 8 hours' sleep, with 4 hours' freedom for relaxation and meals, leaving 12 hours for work and study except at times of harvest.

Henceforth communal mess halls and children's nurseries must be better run. Parents should be allowed to take their children home occasionally. In building "residential quarters," space should be provided "suited to the living together of men and women and the aged and young of each family."

Although this suggests that the Peking Government has run into difficulty, it would be wishful thinking to assume that a change of direction is in the making. The goals of the commune program have been sturdily reemphasized. The stress is on the need for a somewhat slower pace to educate the laggards and to restrain certain overeager comrades.

The leaders of Communist China know that the success or failure of their efforts will be determined largely in the villages. Although the difficulties are admittedly great, they may argue persuasively that here at least they are far more experienced than were their Soviet counterparts.

The Russian Revolution was made by only 200,000 party members. They were mostly intellectuals and workers with their roots in the cities. Lenin's announcement of "all land to the tiller," skillfully timed to climax the revolutionary upheaval in Moscow and Leningrad, secured the cooperation of the Russian peasants. But they were never made to feel a part of the movement itself.

The Chinese Revolution, on the other hand, has always been deeply rooted in the villages. The 5 million party members who organized the countryside as a prelude to the advance of the Red armies have now grown to 13 million, and most of them are of peasant stock. Under the direction of this rural-oriented Communist leadership and subleadership, many of China's 1 million villages have already known two decades of evolving discipline.

Out of this intensive rural experience have evolved certain strong social and political appeals which have been tested and perfected under varying conditions. With these techniques the Communist leaders believe they can maintain a revolutionary enthusiasm which will carry China through this perilous period of development and create the capital for rapid industrialization.

In place of the uncertain but highly personal security rooted in close family relationships and ancient religious dogma, they have substituted a system that provides a dreary day-to-day sustenance in return for unswerving subservience to the will of the central government.

In place of the traditional economic incentive of increased consumer goods, they have substituted festivals, complete with booming brass gongs and sputtering firecrackers, dances, parades and mass condemnation of "enemies of the people."

Millions of official loudspeakers, supplemented by constant "study meetings," goad the people to greater effort, often by fanning the flames of external conflict. In this process the United States serves as a special target for vituperation unmatched even in this age of international mudslinging.

When the occasion calls for it, the Kremlin can muster thousands of angry demonstrators against the West. But the Peking government can produce millions, as the Middle East and Quemoy crises demonstrated.

"All of China boils with wrath," proclaimed Radio Peking when the U.S. Marines landed in Lebanon.

"I will send all my six sons to the front again," a ——— "democratic mother" is reported to have said.

"Americans take care," warned a scientist in Canton, "or you will have your brains bashed out."

In Fukien, the province directly across the Formosa Strait from the Nationalist-held island, the peasants are said to have "pledged themselves to outstrip last year's production as a concrete contribution to helping our army units liberate Formosa."

A succesesful revolution generates its own initial enthusiasm. Through the expert use of radio, the printed word and mass organization the Chinese Revolution has surpassed most others. But the Chinese Communist leaders face an infinitely greater task, and human nature being what it is, a diet of promises, parades and propaganda, no matter how skillfully administered, ultimately may prove inadequate.

What then can be said about Chinese claims of record-breaking crops already achieved through China's "4-year campaign of suffering to build a glorious future"?

Agricultural experts who know Asia best reject the 1958 production figures as substantially beyond agricultural experience anywhere in the world. Sizable increases have undoubtedly been achieved, and more will follow.

But even with the most favorable weather and the near-total mobilization of human energies, food production in China, as elsewhere, faces certain harsh realities which cannot be exorcised by Communist slogans. The chief obstacle to the success of her effort is China's vast population, growing at the rate of 16 million souls each year and crowded into her enormous but limited land area.

The present average is less than 2 acres for each rural family. With the exception of a few western areas, most of China's readily arable land is now under intensive cultivation. New acreage even there can be brought under cultivation only at a very high cost.

The fact that the people are already living largely on rice, wheat, and vegetables means that there is little grain to be saved by reducing livestock consumption, as Stalin did. Furthermore, output per acre is already high. Long before China succumbed to communism the peasants were using better seeds, more abundant natural fertilizers, and more skilled planting and harvesting techniques than in almost any other underdeveloped country except Egypt.

Although Japanese output per acre has been almost twice as great, these levels appear beyond China's reach in the foreseeable future. Each Japanese peasant family has the incentive of working its own small farm. Equally important, the Japanese peasant can buy ample supplies of commercial fertilizers on easy credit.

If the Chinese peasants could match the Japanese use of nearly half a ton of fertilizer per acre annually, they could boost their output substantially. The massive Hwai and Yangtze River irrigation programs could increase it still further. But the building of a chemical industry that could provide fertilizer in any such quantity does not appear in the cards, even with substantial help from the U.S.S.R.

These, then, are the harsh social and economic realities of China's rural economy which must be considered side by side with Peiping's boasts of a steel industry that will soon outproduce that of the United Kingdom, of endlessly expanding coal production, booming hydroelectric development, and fast-spreading new railroad systems.

If this extraordinary totalitarian experiment succeeds in spite of these obstacles, the world Communist movement will almost certainly be centered in a vital new China, with one-fourth the world's population on a rapidly developing industrial base. Unless there is an unforseen change in Chinese attitudes toward the people of America and Europe such a development would be ominous.

But what is the most likely course of events in Asia if this breathtaking gamble fails to pay off? There are at least three possibilities on which we may speculate.

First, under such circumstances it is barely conceivable that the Peiping Government would modify its external policies and become gradually easier to live with. It is not essential that each country produce all its own food. Britain, the Netherlands, and Japan are among the many crowded nations with high living standards which import a major part of their food requirements. A more moderate Chinese leadership, confronted with increasing difficulty in feeding its people and eager for a period of peace, could trade its manufactured goods for rice and wheat grown elsewhere.

But such a change appears unlikely. The "New China" is driven by a doctrinaire nationalism, fiercely intent on economic self-sufficiency. As her leaders consider China's vast and rapidly growing population insecurely based on limited land resources, they may be expected to look beyond China's borders for new areas which can be brought under their control.

Second, a possible solution lies in the Soviet Union itself. With a population one-third that of China, the U.S.S.R. has twice her land area. In theory, a decision by the Kremlin to allow the comradely sharing of her eastern lands with Chinese colonizers would allow China's rapid industrialization to proceed on schedule. The resulting economic, political, and military colossus would include nearly one-third of the world's populatiion. Stretching in one unbroken, tightly controlled Communist federation from Berlin to Canton, it offers a chilling prospect.

Fortunately, there are some formidable physical, nationalistic, and human obstacles in the way of its fulfillment. The limitations of climate and water, for instance, make Siberian agriculture a season-to-season gamble. An even greater barrier is the national pride and security of the Soviet Union itself. Economic and political integration on a scale sufficient to solve China's land hunger would be a giant step toward Chinese domination of the Soviet Union, the Communist movement, and, ultimately, of the world itself. The men in the Kremlin could scarcely be expected to welcome such a development.

Finally, there remains a third possibility. The Chinese Communist leaders may look increasingly toward Southeast Asia as the solution to their economic and political dilemma. In terms of China's long cultural history, most of this area is newly colonized land and relatively underdeveloped. It is also fertile land, blessed, by and large, with rich soil, ample rainfall, and a warm, year-round sun that normally assures two crops annually.

Although some areas, such as Java, are greatly overpopulated, nearby Sumatra could absorb 40 million to 50 million more people. Burma could support far more than its present population. So could the Philippines, South Vietnam, Cambodia, Laos, Thailand, and Malaya.

If the Chinese leadership decides further to increase its pressure into these lush lands to the south, it will be a case of history repeating itself. Down through the centuries Chinese dynasties in their glittering imperial court in Peking sent their emissaries to demand tribute from southeast Asian princes.

In periods of aggressive strength, Chinese emperors sometimes sought to buttress this big-brother relationship both by extensive trade relations and military expeditions southward. Chinese influence was particularly strong in Vietnam, where Chinese-satellite states existed for centuries. If the Ming emperors in the mid-15th century had not pulled back from the beginnings of an unprecedented national program of naval and maritime expansion, southeast Asia might today be part of China.

Meanwhile, modern China appears already to be on the move. The Communist successors to the emperors of Peking are reasserting their traditional role in this area. Chinese trade to southeast Asia is being increased substantially. In 1949, Chinese exports were almost nonexistent. By 1955 they had risen to $209 million. In 1958 they were $309 million.

India's trade in southeast Asia has been cut nearly 40 percent by these new Chinese exports. Great Britain's has also been seriously hurt. Japanese goods are being undersold 10 to 15 percent in countries on which Tokyo has been counting as an essential market and source of raw materials.

Ironically, most Chinese exports into southeast Asia are the very consumer goods which the Peking Government denies its own people. A British bicycle in Kuala Lumpur costs $35. The Chinese equivalent, which sells for $70 in Peking—more than a year's average income—costs the Malayans only $14.

Although these exports fell abruptly early this year, it seems likely that the flow will again be resumed. Some observers speculate that the interruption was due to the need to meet overdue payments to the Soviet Government for heavy machinery delivered to China early in 1958.

At the same time, Peking has been stepping up its effort to win the political allegiance of the 13 million Chinese who live in the larger southeast Asian cities and who retain close cultural and linguistic ties with the Chinese heartland. Chinese maps, inherited, so Peking says, from Chiang Kai-shek, still proclaim Chinese sovereignty over sizable border sections of Burma, Bhutan, and India. Radio Peking regularly asserts Chinese superiority over all foreign barbarians.

Regardless of the success or failure of China's experiment in pure communism, it is apparent that an explosive new force is being generated in Asia which will exert increasing influence on the world power balance.

The means by which we can help blunt this force and lay the basis for orderly and peaceful relationships are beyond the scope of this article. A few brief observations, however, may be in order:

1. Communist China will be with us for the foreseeable future. It is wishful thinking to assume that it will vanish conveniently in a peasant uprising.

2. Although the entrance of this dynamic new element into the world stage creates profound difficulties for us, it also constitutes a potential threat to the Soviet Union. The ultimate effect on relations between Moscow and Peking is impossible to foresee.

3. In order to cope effectively with the challenge, we Americans sorely need a long-term perspective and long-term plans to go with it. These plans should be rooted in the realities of Asian attitudes, economics, politics, and geography. Expedient, crisis-to-crisis moves based on the illusion of American military omnipotence will almost certainly fail.

4. The principles and techniques which will work best in Southeast Asia should be fundamental to American policy throughout the underdeveloped continents. These may include a more careful selection of the men and women to represent us abroad, a revamped economic-aid program, less emphasis on regimes and more on people, some such device as a World Food Bank to distribute surplus food more effectively and a program to help stabilize the prices of raw materials.

5. Although most Southeastern Asian governments are frail and uncertain, they are increasingly aware of the danger of Chinese aggression and the brutality of Communist techniques. It is particularly reassuring that this awareness is spreading to India, which centuries ago provided the principal counterforce to Chinese expansion into Southeast Asia and may conceivably play this role in the future.

6. Once we begin to act positively within the economic and political framework of the American revolutionary tradition, we will elicit a heart-warming response from non-Communist peoples throughout the world.

In these next decisive years an awakened America, prepared to look the facts about modern Asia squarely in the face, can play a vital role in stopping the spread of communism without war. Thoughtful men in Asia, Africa, Latin America, and Europe fervently hope that we will play it.

Friends and Enemies—Book Review of Adlai Stevenson's Report on Russia

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, April 17, 1959

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, in addition to my remarks on the article by Mr. Bowles I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a book review I was privileged to write on the book entitled "Friends and Enemies," written by Adlai Stevenson, the review being entitled "Stevenson on Russia: The Great Battle May Be Economic," published in the Washington Post and Times Herald of March 22, 1959.

There being no objection, the book review was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STEVENSON ON RUSSIA: THE GREAT BATTLE MAY BE ECONOMIC

(Reviewed by HUBERT H. HUMPHREY)

(Senator HUMPHREY's own visit to Russia, and his interview with Khrushchev, made news last December.)

("Friends and Enemies: What I Learned in Russia," by Adlai Stevenson; Harper.)

Any report from Governor Stevenson of his visit to the Soviet Union is to be welcomed. This slim volume summarizing a series of articles which appeared immediately following Governor Stevenson's return to the United States should be must reading—especially for those of us with responsibility in the field of American foreign policy. I read the original articles with keen interest and am delighted that they are now available in this permanent form.

Mr. Stevenson's book stresses the warmth and friendliness of the Soviet people and the startling paradox of the Soviet leaders who exhibit public wrath against the United States and private cordiality to visitors from America.

In his introduction, Mr. Stevenson raises some important questions: Why shouldn't we trade with the Soviets? Why shouldn't we help them to improve their living standards? The inferred answer is that a Soviet nation with a high living standard may be a more peacefully inclined power.

These questions also reflect his conviction that it is the economic battlefield that may well be decisive in the world struggle. He dramatically underlines the success of the Soviet economic-political offensive in the underdeveloped countries.

Russia, he says, has a great attraction for other poor nations, because as a poor nation it has pulled itself up by its own bootstraps. He points out that the Russian offensive in these decisive areas employs many techniques: cutting prices to get foreign exchange and to capture markets, bartering, purchasing commodities which other countries desperately want to sell, lending money at long-term, low-interest rates, and constructing industrial plants. And—this is important—providing technicians who speak the languages and live humbly like the local people.

Every thoughtful American should reflect on Governor Stevenson's conclusion that the West could go the way of the Athenian democracy in its long struggle with Sparta when an infinitely superior civilization went under, because it lacked the self-discipline to survive. Is the United States today, asks Stevenson, so preoccupied with the military struggle that we have forgotten the values upon which our country is founded?

Stevenson hopes that we will be willing to change our habits, our political behavior and to replace our complacency with a new sense of urgency. And, so do I. Stevenson's book should be of great help in convincing the leadership of America that the time is very late, the adversary is formidable, and things are not going to get better automatically. His wise and humane approach to the problems of foreign policy is a good example of what American leadership should be.

He believes, and I believe, that our leadership must learn more understanding of the deep human suffering and the vigorous human aspirations that underlie the social and political unheavals now rocking the world—as well as more understanding of the truly magnificent human and economic resources of our Nation which could be employed in more constructive and meaningful policies in the have-not areas in the world.

Tribute to the Late Barrow Lyons

OF
HON. JAMES E. MURRAY
OF MONTANA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Friday, April 17, 1959

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement I have prepared in tribute to the late Barrow Lyons, who passed away on April 5 at his home.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

When Barrow Lyons passed away in his home at 3 a.m., April 5, the people of this country and the Capitol Hill community lost a selfless crusader for humanity and democracy. He was an effective crusader without fanaticism, a fighter without hate.

A rounded man with interests in literature, music, and philosophy, Barrow Lyons in recent years devoted himself especially to the conservation of the natural resources of the United States. He believed unshakably that the natural resources of the United States should belong to all the people of this Nation rather than to a self-appointed few. His book, "Tomorrow's Birthright," published in 1955, remains one of the outstanding studies of the resource problem.

Mr. Lyons had a long and distinguished career as a newspaperman. He worked on such great dailies as the New York Times, the Christian Science Monitor, the Baltimore Sun, and many others. As a science reporter for the Associated Press, as financial editor of the New York World Telegram, as business editor of Newsweek, and as a writer for many other magazines, he brought to bear a scholarly interest in fact with the quick perception of the reporter and the ability to analyze and describe in crisp, concise prose.

In 1938 he came to Washington as a financial economist for the Securities and Exchange Commission to prepare a massive study of the financing of small business from the time of the Revolution to the present century. He served also with the Temporary National Economic Committee.

Later Mr. Lyons became an information specialist with the War Production Board. In 1944 he moved over to become the chief of information for the Bureau of Reclamation. It was in this position that his interest in and knowledge of "tomorrow's birthright" deepened. He retired from Government service in 1952, but continued to write voluminously on economic, political, and resource affairs.

Throughout his years in Washington, Barrow Lyons was well known to dozens of Senators and Congressmen, many of whom sought his advice. He was respected and liked by his newspaper colleagues. He was also known widely in the cooperative movement throughout the Nation. He was an active, effective member of many organizations, ranging from the Cosmos Club and the National Press Club to the National Grange, the Cooperative Forum, the Electric Consumers' Information Committee, and American Newspaper Guild.

Although he had been suffering from heart trouble for several years, Mr. Lyons remained always ready to lend his amazingly youthful vigor to a humane cause, large or small. Typically, during the last few weeks of his life, he was spearheading an effort to organize a memorial service for his friend, the late Tom Stokes, the renowned columnist who, like Mr. Lyons, was concerned over the depletion of our natural wealth.

The world has no shortage of cause supporters. It was Barrow Lyons' quiet distinction that he remained doggedly independent and courageous without bluster, bluff, or sham. He never let his interest in one goal blind him to the significance of others. Thus, although he is most closely identified with conservation and public power, Barrow Lyons also worked without fanfare for election reform, for aid to small business, for decent unionism. He never made a nickel out of his services; he never sought remuneration. He was sophisticated, but in 69 years he never grew cynical.

Beyond this, Barrow Lyons never grew inconsiderate of human beings because of a preoccupation with humanity. His generosity of spirit, his twinkling humor, his thoughtfulness, and his literal love for his fellow men affected—and bettered—all those who knew him. More than anything else, this is the birthright he leaves to tomorrow.

SENATE

MONDAY, APRIL 20, 1959

(Legislative day of Wednesday, April 15, 1959)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Thy voice, O God, is calling
Its summons unto men;
As once Thou spake in Zion,
So now it speaks again.

To this anguished generation we hear Thy voice saying in all the woe of Thy world—

I hear My people crying
In cot and mine and slum;
No field or mart is silent,
No city street is dumb.

I see My people falling
In darkness and despair.
Whom shall I send to shatter
The fetters which they bear?

We heed, O Lord, Thy summons,
And answer: Here are we.
Send us upon Thine errand,
Let us Thy servants be.

Our strength is dust and ashes,
Our years a passing hour;
But Thou canst use our weakness
To magnify Thy power.

From ease and plenty save us;
From pride of place absolve;
Purge us of low desire;
Lift us to high resolve.

Take us, and make us holy;
Teach us Thy will and way.
Speak, and, behold: we answer;
Command, and we obey.

And Thine shall be the kingdom, and the power and the glory. Amen.

A resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of Missouri; to the Committee on Finance:

"HOUSE RESOLUTION 138

"Resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to establish a sliding scale tariff on lead imports for the purpose of combating excessive foreign imports on the market

"Whereas the excess of foreign imports flooding the lead market has driven prices down and reduced the demand for domestically produced lead; and

"Whereas the lead industry, as a result, is in severe financial difficulties which will necessitate curtailment of operations unless the Government provides some effective aid; and

"Whereas, one company has been forced to borrow $20 million to carry its inventories and to help develop lower cost sources of lead and as of February has gone on a 4-day week in the six southeast Missouri counties where the company operates; and

"Whereas, the quotas which were imposed on lead imports have been ineffective to control the situation and contain loopholes which are being exploited to the detriment of the domestic industry: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Missouri House of Representatives in its 70th General Assembly request of the Congress of the United States that it enact legislation establishing a sliding scale tariff on lead imports; and be it further

"Resolved, That the clerk of the house be instructed to send copies of this memorial to the President of the U.S. Senate, to the Speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives, and to the Missouri Members of the House and Senate."

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire; to the Committee on the Judiciary:

"CONCURRENT RESOLUTION MEMORIALIZING CONGRESS TO CALL A CONVENTION TO PROPOSE A CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT TO PROHIBIT THE STATES FROM LEVYING TAXES UPON THE INCOMES OF NONRESIDENTS

"Whereas, several States levy an income tax at the source which is enforced against the incomes of nonresidents derived from employment in said States; and

"Whereas residents of other States are employed in States having such taxes and are being subjected to such tax; and

"Whereas it is highly unjust, inequitable, and discriminatory that such nonresidents be compelled to contribute through said tax to the support of the government of States in which they have no voice, and from which they receive little benefit, the same being a clear case of taxation without representation and contrary to all the principles upon which the American system of government is founded: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the senate with the house of representatives concurring, That the General Court of the State of New Hampshire, being the legislature of said State, hereby makes application that the Congress, acting in conformity with article V of the Constitution of the United States, call a convention for proposing amendments to said Constitution; and particularly for proposing an amendment in substantially the following form:

" 'No State shall make or enforce any law to lay or collect any tax on the income derived from wages, salaries, professional fees, and other amounts received as compensation for personal services actually rendered, of any natural person who is not a resident of that State;' further

"Resolved, That the secretary of state transmit a copy of this concurrent resolution to the President of the Senate and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States and two copies to the secretary of state of each State of the Union with a request that he lay one of such copies before each branch of the legislature of his State, and that he further transmit copies hereof to the members of the New Hampshire delegation in Congress.

JOHN FOSTER DULLES—CONCURRENT RESOLUTION OF NEW YORK LEGISLATURE

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, the Legislature of the State of New York recently adopted a concurrent resolution expressing the gratitude of the people of the State of New York to the Honorable John Foster Dulles.

Because this concurrent resolution expresses so well many of the feelings with respect to Mr. Dulles that are in the hearts of all Americans, I ask unanimous consent that the concurrent resolution be published in the RECORD, and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONCURRENT RESOLUTION OF THE SENATE AND ASSEMBLY EXPRESSING THE GRATITUDE OF THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK TO JOHN FOSTER DULLES

Whereas the Honorable John Foster Dulles, the Secretary of State of the United States of America, has dedicated and devoted the extraordinary span of his great career of public service to the quest for peace and freedom; and

Whereas his distinguished service in the area of foreign affairs and international diplomacy has benefited and will continue to benefit not only the people of the United States of America but all of mankind and humanity; and

Whereas his determination and zeal in attaining the goal of enduring peace, with honor and justice, first found official expression and recognition when he participated in the Hague Peace Conference in 1907, the first great 20th century conference designed to substitute reason for violence as the arbiter of international differences; and

Whereas he was an adviser to the American delegation at the Versailles Peace Conference in 1919, which gave creation to President Wilson's magnificent concept of an international association of the world's nations, to act in concert in abandoning war as an instrument of resolving disputes between nations; and

Whereas working with the Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, he symbolized the determination of the people of the United States for a bipartisan foreign policy during World War II and later during the critical early years of the cold war; and

Whereas by appointment of President Truman, he was a member of the U.S. delegation at San Francisco in 1945, when most of the governments of the world again created an international organization to enforce and preserve peace; and he represented the United States in the United Nations' General Assembly for several years, and was acting chairman of the U.S. delegation at the General Assembly at Paris in 1948; and

Whereas he served as an advisor to the Secretary of State of the United States at crucial meetings of the major powers' foreign ministers, at London in 1945 and 1947, at Moscow in 1947 and at Paris in 1949; and

Whereas in 1951 he negotiated the peace treaty with the Empire of Japan, an historic agreement under which the peoples of the western free world live in peaceful understanding and amicable relations with a former enemy people who are now staunch allies on the side against evil and darkness; and

Whereas his long service enabled him to bring a valuable continuity to the Office of Secretary of State when President Eisenhower entrusted to him the grave responsibility of conducting our Nation's foreign policy—a responsibility second only to the President's in assuring the survival of freedom; and

Whereas as Secretary of State, he has made lasting contributions to the cause of peace with honor and justice, by policies firm in fundamentals but flexible in execution, enabling our Nation to exert a decisive and timely positive influence in international affairs; and

Whereas as Secretary of State, he has been instrumental in the development of policy and formulation of action which ended fighting in Korea; enabled our country to effect termination of hostilities in Indo-China, without military involvement; forestalled a Communist invasion across the Formosa Strait; and, by resolute and courageous decision in answer to an appeal by the Government of Lebanon, prevented the Mideast from becoming a Communist crossroads; and

Whereas by his personal dedication, devotion and integrity, and his unflagging zeal and vigor in carrying on this career-long mission for peace, he has kindled in all Americans a deeper understanding and appreciation of their country's responsibility and role in preserving and safeguarding peace, freedom, and justice throughout the world; and

Whereas no American in this century has served our country so long and so effectively, in this crucial area in which war and peace are suspended in balance, or has given his high office such dimensions in distinction; and

Whereas John Foster Dulles is an illustrious son of the State of New York, which he ably represented in the Senate of the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved (if the senate, assembly, concur), That the Legislature of the State of New York express to John Foster Dulles, on behalf of the people of the State of New York, deep gratitude for his statesmanship and contributions to the cause of peace and honor and prayerful wishes for a complete recovery of his health and an early return to active service in the cause to which he has dedicated his life; and be it further Resolved (if the senate, assembly, concur), that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Honorable John Foster Dulles at Washington, D.C.

MULTIPLE TAXATION—RESOLUTION OF CHELSEA, MASS., CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution for the purpose of calling the attention of Senators and the country to a problem caused by the recent Supreme Court decisions permitting State taxation of the net income of businesses engaged in interstate commerce. These cases were Northwestern States Portland Cement Company v. State of Minnesota, No. 12, October term, 1958, and T. V. Williams, State Revenue Commissioner v. Stockham Valves and Fittings, Inc., No. 33, October term, 1958, both decided February 24, 1959.

The possibility of multiple taxation and the increased complexities of collection are alarming the business community, particularly small business concerns. Their apprehension is well expressed in a resolution just forwarded to me by H. M. Davis on behalf of the board of directors of the Chelsea, Mass., Chamber of Commerce. They have done a great service by calling our attention to this problem.

The Senate Committee on Small Business is studying this question and its first public hearing has been held. It is my hope that the Committee will be able to make recommendations which will encourage small business, strengthen our economy and protect interstate commerce from an unfair burden of taxation.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION OF BOARD OF DIRECTORS, CHELSEA (MASS.) CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Whereas the Supreme Court of the United States has recently ruled that corporations doing business in interstate commerce are subject to income tax in the various States to which they ship merchandise.

Therefore, the board of directors of the Chelsea Chamber of Commerce, believing that the cost of complying with this law will prove to be excessive and burdensome; that, in many cases, particularly with small manufacturers, these costs will be greater than the taxes involved; that because each State will have its own rate and governing rules, an individual study of the law of each State will be required, entailing excessive labor and expense, has passed the following resolution: Be it

Resolved by the board of directors of the Chelsea Chamber of Commerce, in meeting assembled on March 18, That this ruling creates an excessive burden and expense on interstate commerce; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the press, the Chamber of Commerce of the United States and to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

AIRLINE SERVICE IN KANSAS—RESOLUTION OF MAYORS' COMMITTEE OF KANSAS

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the mayors' committee of the State of Kansas requesting appropriate action in expediting the final decision in the Kansas-Oklahoma Local Service Case, docket No. 5482 and others. The docket referred to pertains to expanded airline service in Kansas. The lack of airline service there has been a detriment to more than half the communities in my State.

The resolution to which I refer is signed by mayors or representatives of Great Bend, Parsons, Salina, Pittsburg, Hays, Independence, Emporia, Goodland, Manhattan, Kansas City, Junction City, Topeka, Concordia, Oberlin, Hill City, Beloit, and 12 municipalities grouped together as joint cities of western Kansas and eastern Colorado.

This resolution was adopted April 15, 1959, the same date on which I telegraphed Ross Beach, president of the Kansas State Chamber of Commerce, suggesting that he and the mayors of Kansas could be of tremendous help in crystallizing and focusing attention on the State's need for improved air service. The following day I received a telegram advising me of the group's protest against any further delay or continuance in the case of docket No. 5482. Today I received a copy of the resolution.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION RELATING TO AIR SERVICE IN KANSAS

Whereas air service to cities in Kansas has deteriorated in recent years with terminations of service by trunkline carriers to the point that we now have but one certificated trunkline stop in the State of Kansas; and

Whereas Kansas now shows on the map as a virtual blank as far as certificated local carrier air service is concerned; and

Whereas the proceeding known as the Kansas-Oklahoma Local Service Case, docket No. 5482 et al., was instituted over a year ago; hearings therein began on July 15, 1958, but were not concluded until January 8, 1959; and the filing date for briefs to the examiner has been extended repeatedly to May 1, 1959, with a further application for extension pending; and

Whereas in the meantime applications for temporary exemptions to permit interim service have been denied; and

Whereas this lack of acceptable airline service is greatly damaging to our local economies and is thus detrimental to the economy of the entire State: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Mayors' Committee of the State of Kansas, assembled in Salina, Kans., on April 15, 1959, That the Civil Aeronautics Board be urged to expedite the proceeding known as the Kansas-Oklahoma Local Service Case, docket No. 5482 et al., and arrive at an early decision approving service to the cities in Kansas and Oklahoma; and be it further

Resolved, That the mayors' committee of the State of Kansas on behalf of the undersigned representatives of 28 cities and Chambers of commerce, representing all 6 congressional districts be instructed to forward a copy of this resolution to each member of the Civil Aeronautics Board, to the hearing examiner and bureau counsel and to all Kansas, Oklahoma, Nebraska, Colorado, and Missouri Senators and Representatives in Congress; to the Governor of the State of Kansas and the Governor of the State of Oklahoma; to the Kansas State Chamber of Commerce and the Kansas Industrial Development Commission, together with a request that each such official or agency take appropriate action in order to expedite the final decision in the Kansas-Oklahoma Service Case.

Adopted this 15th day of April 1959.

R. E. Morrison, Great Bend, Kans.; H. Jaeger, Salina, Kans.; Merle O'Loughlin, Hays, Kans.; H. E. Hamlin, Emporia, Kans.; Myron Rooks, Manhattan, Kans.; Robert K. RESOLUTIONS OF ORGANIZATIONS OF STATE OF NEW YORK

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I present, for appropriate reference, sundry resolutions adopted by organizations of the State of New York. I ask unanimous consent that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were received, appropriately referred, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Committee on Appropriations:

"RESOLUTION BY SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON TAXES AND GOVERNMENTAL ECONOMY

"Whereas drastic reduction in the expenditures of the agencies of the Federal Government is the principal means whereby inflation can be curbed; and

"Whereas expenditures for domestic programs, meritorious though they may be, must, in good judgment, be limited if the United States of America must continue its vast expenditures for defense purposes and economic and military aid to allied and neutral countries throughout the world: Be it

"Resolved, That the New York Board of Trade call upon its representatives in the Congress to vote in opposition to any measures which would extend Federal expenditures beyond the limits imposed by the budget submitted to the Congress by the President.

"Adopted by the board of directors of the New York Board of Trade, Inc., meeting in session regularly assembled on this 7th day of April 1959."

To the Committee on Foreign Relations:

"Assembled on the 5th day of April 1959 at the Polish National Home in Manhattan, N. Y., the delegates of the 15th annual meeting of downstate New York division of the Polish American Congress, representing over 600,000 American citizens of Polish lineage, resolve the following:

"1. We hail with extreme pleasure the statement contained in President Eisenhower's declaration announced yesterday in historical Gettysburg, to the effect that there will be no so-called appeasement or capitulation to totalitarian communism in connection with the prevailing world situation and the critical issue of Berlin.

"2. We voice the gratification of Americans of Polish descent from downstate New York and welcome the stand adopted by the Department of State with regard to recognition of the Polish western frontier along the Oder and Neisse Rivers. We are happy to note that a similar and absolutely positive attitude to the same problem was expressed by the French President de Gaulle. We consequently endorse the decisions of the national executive body of the Polish American Congress who had submitted our joint demands in a memorandum to the Assistant Secretary of State Kohler and to Senator FULBRIGHT, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, on March 16, 1959. We are pleased to acknowledge that the many years' efforts and manifestations on the part of Americans of Polish descent affiliated with the Polish American Congress, who strove for recognition by the United States of the above-mentioned frontier are finally bearing fruit.

"3. We also fully endorse the request of the national Polish American Congress calling for adequate economic aid to the people of Poland by the United States. In particular, we join the declaration made by the national Polish American Congress which was unanimously approved at their meeting in Washington on March 17, 1959, and called for 'such an economic aid to Poland by the United States as would relieve the plight of the people of Poland and would enable them to at least partially improve their economic situation.'

"4. We call upon our members and on all Americans of Polish extraction to follow a straightforward course on the problem of aid to Poland and consequently urge them to continue sending individual relief parcels to their nearest in Poland. This becomes imperative in the face of the recent decision by the American Relief for Poland organization and the latter's inability to carry on individual aid to the Poles in their native land. Individual relief should be continued until the situation of our countrymen in Poland is improved.

"5. Like the national Polish American Congress, we express our appreciation to the Polish American Immigration and Relief Committee, Inc., for its appropriate and, what is most important, its effective protection of Polish escapees against the arbitrary verdicts of deportation from the United States to Poland. Like the national Polish American Congress, we take this opportunity to pledge full support to the Polish American Immigration and Relief Committee, Inc., and we appeal to the large masses of Americans of Polish descent to lend full assistance to that institution which takes care of the Polish refugees and escapees and which deserves to be upheld.

"6. We reiterate the ideological principles professed by the Polish American Congress since its foundation 15 years ago in Buffalo. In particular, we call attention to the fact that apart from the subject of recognition of the Polish western frontier along the Oder and Neisse Rivers by the United States and the Western Powers, there remains the unfilled prerequisite of withdrawal of Soviet troops to prewar boundaries as of September 1, 1939, and restoration to Poland of her eastern lands robbed by Soviet Russia. There is also the unimplemented provision calling for free unfettered elections to be held in all the central and eastern European countries enslaved by Moscow, and finally nonadmission of the present arrangement as being permanent in said countries, briefly—opposition to the stabilization of their present status quo spelling slavery.

"7. We assert jointly with all the Polish independence movement and the well-informed part of the American public that the Communist Party in Poland and the Warsaw regime established by them, in spite of its name of "People's Democracy" is neither a democracy nor does it represent the Polish people. Furthermore, we declare that in spite of the milder course adopted by the present regime in Poland as compared to the ruthless ruling methods of its predecessors during the Stalin era, it is still alien to the Polish people by its nature and its spirit. Hence, taking in consideration the existing state of affairs and with full understanding of the problem involved, we pay high tribute to the people of Poland who are forced to live under a foreign system imposed upon them, while they display a splendid spirit of unshakable loyalty to their true ideals.

"8. We express our firm belief that a stepped-up activity on the part of all individual members of the Polish American Congress toward a realization of our goals specified above, will strengthen our internal unity and resistance to the attempts of our totalitarian enemies in their endeavor to penetrate our ranks by means of the well-known method of infiltration, so as to undermine our peaceful existence. Our assembly feels that such an intensified activity of the Polish American Congress will contribute to bolstering of the U.S. defense against Communist aggression and will also increase our share of contribution to our common American heritage.

"WORLD COURT RESOLUTION

"Whereas a determined effort is being made to induce the Senate of the United States to expand the powers of the World Court by vesting in the World Court the authority to decide what American cases before it constitute international disputes subject to the World Court jurisdiction and which cases are domestic in nature to be left for American courts; and

"Whereas the retention of the power to determine such vital questions by the American Government was a specific condition imposed by the Senate in accepting the jurisdiction of the World Court in purely international disputes; and

"Whereas the removal of such conditions by the Senate would seriously impair the sovereignty of the United States and vest in an essentially foreign tribunal a potential power over purely domestic matters involving the basic rights of American citizens should such foreign court so determine; and

"Whereas the recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States which is composed entirely of American citizens have been seriously attacked by American jurists of the highest stature as improper exercise of judicial power under the American Constitution indicating the tremendous possibilities of the invasion of the rights of American citizens through an excessive exercise of power by the World Court; and

"Whereas such impairment of American sovereignty can well serve as a stepping stone to complete world government by those groups endeavoring to propel the American Nation into such alien control: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the legislative committee of the Republican Committee of One Hundred hereby requests the Senate of the United States to reject emphatically all efforts aimed at impairing the sovereignty of the United States through abandoning the present power of the American Government to limit the jurisdiction of the World Court to purely international affairs.

"ELIZABETH S. COWLES,
"Legislative Chairman."

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

"RESOLUTION 37-D

"Whereas an agency of our Federal Government has recently awarded a contract for a large steam turbine generator to a foreign firm; and

"Whereas many of the employees of the Schenectady plant of the General Electric Co. are residents of Rensselaer County; and

"Whereas the economy of the county and of all other areas adjacent to Schenectady have been adversely affected by the aforesaid award, and would be adversely affected by any future awards of this nature; and

"Whereas the defense effort and capability of our country will be deterred by any future awards of this nature: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That it is the opinion of the Rensselaer County Board of Supervisors that appropriate legislation be adopted whereby agencies of our Federal Government would be required to confine the award of contracts to domestic firms when such action will be to the best interests of the economy and defense of our country, and be it further

"Resolved, That the clerk of the board of supervisors be and he is hereby directed to forward copies of this resolution to Hon. Dwight D. Eisenhower, President of the United States; Senator Jacob Javits, Senator Kenneth Keating, Congressman Dean P. Taylor, and Congressman Leo O'Brien."

To the Committee on Public Works:

"RESOLUTION 59: CONTINUATION OF FEDERAL PROJECTS URGED

"Whereas our future economic development and growth within the State and Nation depend in large measure on the continuous modernization and improvement of our connecting highway systems; and

"Whereas it now appears that a deficit of approximately $241 million looms in the Federal highway trust fund, beginning July 1, 1959: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That Congress be memorialized to face this critical financial situation affecting our Federal and interstate highway programs and take such action as to provide for a continuation of progress already made in this field, as well as to stimulate the economy in various economically depressed areas; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to our representatives in Congress."

PROPOSED LEGISLATION TO AMEND COMMUNICATIONS ACT OF 1934

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, by request of the Federal Communications Commission, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a series of nine bills to amend the Communications Act of 1934. I ask unanimous consent that the letters and explanations accompanying these bills may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bills will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the explanation or letter accompanying each bill, will be printed in the RECORD.

The bills, introduced by Mr. MAGNUSON, by request, were received, read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, as follows:

S. 1733. A bill to amend subsection (b) of section 309 of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended.

(The explanation accompanying Senate bill 1733 is as follows:)

EXPLANATION OF FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION WITH RESPECT TO ITS SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO SECTION 309(B) OF THE COMMUNICATIONS ACT OF 1934, AS AMENDED (47 U.S.C. 309(B))

Section 309(b) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended (47 U.S.C. 309(b)), requires in part that, before any application for a radio authorization is designated for a hearing, the Federal Communications Commission shall notify the applicant and other known parties in interest of the grounds and reasons why the Commission is unable to make the finding specified in subsection (a) of section 309 that the public interest, convenience, and necessity would be served by the grant of the application. Such notice must also advise the applicant and known parties in interest of all objections made to the application as well as the source and nature of the objections. The purpose of the notice is to afford the applicant an opportunity to correct deficiencies in his application and thus avoid the necessity for a hearing. Rarely does the response to the section 309(b) notice obviate the necessity for a hearing, and, in view of the impact of the notice requirement upon the processing of applications, the Commission urges that the requirement for a prehearing notice be eliminated entirely.

As a result of the 309(b) notice requirement, each application which cannot be granted without hearing is processed at least twice: once completely in connection with the preparation of the 309(b) notice, and again at least in part when a reply is received from the applicant. The extent of the second processing will vary dependent upon the number of deficiencies cited in the notice and the nature of the amendments filed in response. The filing of a conflicting application between the time of issuing the section 309(b) notice and the reprocessing requires another 309(b) notice and an additional processing of the old application. A second 309(b) notice is also required if the reply or amendment induced by the first notice raises a new question. Thus, the requirement for a 309(b) notice, even if there are no further complications that require a second notice, adds at least 2 months to the time for processing an application, including the time spent in the preparation of the notice, the time for reply, the lag before the application is reached for reprocessing, and the actual reprocessing. If complications result from this delay, the processing time for the application is increased still more. In some cases as much as a year has elapsed between the issuance of the first 309(b) notice and the issuance of the hearing order. Indeed, the 309(b) notice requirement has been the largest single contributing factor in the buildup of the huge backlog of standard broadcast applications.

In many cases the only reason why an application cannot be granted without hearing is because a mutually exclusive application is pending. In many other cases the only reason is interference with an existing station or stations. In such cases, and in fact in most all cases, the applicant knows, or should know, the nature of the objections to his application, so that a 309(b) notice serves no useful purpose. Inasmuch as section 309(b) notices are now required in more than 80 percent of the standard broadcast applications, the impact upon the Commission's workload is apparent.

Thus, the Commission's proposed amendment eliminates the requirement in the statute for a prehearing notice to the applicant and known parties in interest before an application is designated for hearing but retains the present provisions of the statute that the hearing issues must be stated with particularity. Inasmuch as under the Commission's procedures an applicant may amend his application after designation for hearing and petition for reconsideration and grant without hearing, the deletion of the requirement of a prehearing notice would have little impact in those few cases where the reply to a prehearing notice would obviate the necessity for a hearing.

S. 1734. A bill to amend section 409(c) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, with respect to presentations in any case of adjudication which has been designated for a hearing by the Federal Communications Commission.

(The letter accompanying Senate bill 1734 is as follows:)

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION,
Washington, D.C., March 19, 1959.

THE VICE PRESIDENT,
U.S. Senate
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: The Commission has adopted as a part of its legislative program for the 86th Congress a proposal to amend section 409(c)(2) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended (47 U.S.C. 409(c)(2) to prohibit any person (except to the extent required for the disposition of ex parte matters as authorized by law), directly or indirectly, from making a presentation to the commissioners unless upon notice and opportunity for all parties to participate.

Accordingly, there are enclosed six copies of our draft bill on this subject and six copies of an explanatory statement with reference thereto.

The consideration by the Senate of the proposed amendment to the Communications Act of 1934 would be greatly appreciated. The Commission would be most happy to furnish any additional information that may be desired by the Senate or by the committee to which this proposal is referred.

We have been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the presentation of the draft bill to the Congress for its consideration.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN C. DOERFER,
Chairman.

EXPLANATION OF PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO SECTION 409(c)(2) OF THE COMMUNICATIONS ACT OF 1934, AS AMENDED (47 U.S.C. 409(c)(2))

Under the provisions of paragraph (2) of subsection (c) of section 409 of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended (47 U.S.C. 409(c)(2)), in any case of adjudication which has been designated for a hearing by the Commission, no person who has participated in the presentation or preparation for presentation with respect to such case before an examiner or the Commission, and no member of the Office of the General Counsel, or the Office of the Chief Engineer, shall (except to the extent required for the disposition of ex parte matters as authorized by law) make any additional presentation therein unless upon notice and opportunity for all parties to participate.

The objective of the proposed amendment is to clarify the present section 409(c)(2) as it does not contain an explicit statutory prohibition against any other person, not identified as above, making a presentation to an examiner or a commissioner in such a case after it has been designated for a hearing; nor is there a specific statutory requirement that any such other person shall give notice of his presentation so as to afford an opportunity for all parties in the case to participate. The attached amendment is designed to correct these omissions in the statute.

The proposed amendment also provides that its terms shall not prevent consultations in such cases among the commissioners, their assistants, and the review staff.

S. 1735. A bill to repeal the honorarium provision in subsection (b) of section 4 of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended.

(The letter accompanying Senate bill 1735 is as follows:)

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION,
Washington, D.C., March 19, 1959.

THE VICE PRESIDENT,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: The Commission has adopted as a part of its legislative program for the 86th Congress a proposal to amend subsection (b) of section 4 of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended (47 U.S.C. 154(b)) to eliminate the provision under which a Commissioner may accept an honorarium for the presentation or delivery of publications or papers.

Accordingly, there are enclosed six copies of our draft bill on this subject and six copies of an explanatory statement with reference thereto.

The considerations by the Senate of the proposed amendment to the Communications Act of 1934 would be greatly appreciated. The Commission would be most happy to furnish any additional information that may be desired by the Senate or by the committee to which this proposal is referred.

We have been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the presentation of the draft bill to the Congress for its consideration.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN C. DOERFER,
Chairman.

EXPLANATION OF PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO SUBSECTION (B) OF SECTION 4 OF THE COMMUNICATIONS ACT OF 1934, 47 UNITED STATES CODE 154(B), 86TH CONGRESS

The Communications Act Amendments, 1952, relaxed a prohibition against Commissioners engaging in any other business, vocation, profession, or employment by providing that this prohibition should not apply to the presentation or delivery of publications or papers for which a reasonable honorarium or compensation may be accepted. 47 U.S.C. 154(b)) The Commission feels that the reasons which led to the adoption of this exemption are outweighed by the ambiguities as to its extent and coverage, and it accordingly recommends its repeal.

S. 1736. A bill to amend the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, by eliminating the requirement of an oath or affirmation on certain documents filed with the Federal Communications Commission.

(The letter accompanying Senate bill 1736, is as follows:)

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION,
Washington, D.C., March 11, 1959.

THE VICE PRESIDENT,
U.S. Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: The Commission has adopted as a part of its legislative program for the 86th Congress a proposal to eliminate the requirement of an oath or affirmation on certain documents filed with the Commission as provided in sections 219, 308, and 319 of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended (47 U.S.C. 219, 308, and 319).

The Commission's draft bill to accomplish the foregoing objective was submitted to the Bureau of the Budget for its consideration. We have now been advised by that Bureau that there is no objection to the presentation of the draft bill to the Congress for its consideration.

Accordingly, there are enclosed six copies of our draft bill on this subject and six copies of an explanatory statement with reference thereto.

The consideration by the Senate of the proposed amendment to the Communications Act of 1934, would be greatly appreciated. The Commission would be most happy to furnish any additional information that may be desired by the Senate or by the committee to which this proposal is referred.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN C. DOERFER,
Chairman.

EXPLANATION OF PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO THE COMMUNICATIONS ACT OF 1934, AS AMENDED, ELIMINATING THE REQUIREMENT OF AN OATH OR AFFIRMATION ON CERTAIN REPORTS AND APPLICATION FORMS SUBMITTED TO THE FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION (47 U.S.C. 219, 308, AND 319)

The Federal Communications Commission recommends to the Congress the consideration of legislation to amend sections 219, 308, and 319 of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, so as to eliminate the requirement of an oath or affirmation on certain reports and application forms submitted to the Commission pursuant to said sections. Affected would be annual and other reports of common carriers required under section 219, and applications for construction permits, station licenses, or modifications or renewals thereof under sections 308 and 319.

As a substitute for the oath or affirmation on Commission forms, where presently required, it is proposed to provide thereon a warning similar to the following:

"Willful false statements on this form can be punished by fine or imprisonment. United States Code, title 18, section 1001."

Such section provides that whoever makes any false or fraudulent statements or representations concerning any matter within the jurisdiction of any department or agency of the United States shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than 5 years, or both. In addition, the Communications Act provides in section 312(a) that a station license or construction permit may be revoked for false statements knowingly made in an application or in any statement of fact which may be required under section 308.

The requirement of an oath or affirmation on certain reports and application forms submitted to the Commission imposed a burden on the public, and also on the Commission in those instances where the applicant omits the required oath or affirmation. In such cases the workload of the Commission is increased to the extent necessary to return reports or application forms for the required verification. This slows up the consideration by the Commission of the matters involved and the processing of applications. Inconvenience and delay to the public result.

The Commission feels, therefore, that the elimination of the oath or affirmation requirements would not adversely affect its interest in view of the aforementioned provisions of the United States Code and the Communications Act, and accordingly urges the enactment of the proposed legislation.

S. 1737. A bill to authorize the imposition of forfeitures for certain violations of the rules and regulations of the Federal Communications Commission in the common carrier and safety and special fields.

EXPLANATION OF PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO TITLE V OF COMMUNICATIONS ACT OF 1934, AS AMENDED, TO AUTHORIZE THE FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION TO IMPOSE FORFEITURES IN CASES OF VIOLATION OF CERTAIN RULES AND REGULATIONS BY RADIO STATIONS IN THE NONBROADCAST SERVICES

The attached legislative proposal amends title V of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, by adding at the end thereof a new section 508. Its purpose is to grant to the Federal Communications Commission authority to impose monetary forfeitures for violations of certain of its rules and regulations relating to radio stations in the common carrier and safety and special fields. This proposal also provides for remission or mitigation by the Commission of such forfeitures by an appropriate amendment to section 504(b) of the Communications Act. (47 U.S.C. 504(b).)

The need for this legislation is emphasized by the rapid and phenomenal expansion in the nonbroadcast radio service since World War II due in large measure to the development of new equipment and the utilization of new portions of the frequency spectrum. Many small companies have been licensed to operate radio stations as specialized common carriers; a still greater expansion has taken place in what are known as the safety and special radio services where radio is employed for numerous diverse purposes by large groups of users such as the maritime and aviation interests, police and fire departments, electric and gas companies, forestry agencies, taxicab companies, highway, truck, and bus companies, etc.

As of September 30, 1958, the number of radio stations (computed on the basis of call letters assigned) in the safety and special radio services alone had risen to 457,124. This represents an increase of several hundred percent over the stations which had been authorized in these services as of June 30, 1946.

In the number of small boats equipped for radiotelephone communications, there has been an increase of approximately 400 percent (from 18,140 to 70,911) for the period 1949 to 1959. One of the most serious enforcement problems confronting the Commission results from the chaotic conditions existing on the small boat radiotelephone frequencies between 2 and 3 megacycles. In areas where there are concentrations of these boats, the misuse of the distress frequency has prevented the transmission of emergency messages to the Coast Guard. Normal enforcement methods such as issuances of rule violation notices and suspension of operator licenses have only been partially successful. During the first quarter of the fiscal year 1959, a total of 558 small boat radio stations were inspected. There were 371 violation notices issued as the result of noncompliance with the Commission's regulations. In addition, 159, or 28 percent, were found to be operating without authority from the Commission. Since inspection of 558 vessels is a very limited sampling of 70,000 boats licensed by the Commission, it is evident that disregard for the Commission's regulations is widespread. These statistics emphasize the inadequacy of the Commission's available enforcement tools in coping with this situation.

One result of the extensive increase in licensed stations in recent years has been a marked increase in the number of violations of the Commission's technical rules and regulations. This is particularly true in some of the newer private services where radio is not the principal activity of the licensee but is utilized as an adjunct to his primary business activities, and the station operators are accordingly less concerned with the necessity for adhering to the technical rules governing the use of radio. Most of the offenses are, taken individually, of a comparatively minor nature. Collectively, however, because of their number and variety they represent a very real menace to the orderly use of the radio spectrum and to efficient regulation by the Commission. In addition, these violations result in a serious menace to life and property in those services, such as maritime and aviation, where radio serves as a vital and necessary safety device.

The Commission has found that its existing sanctions are inadequate to handle the situation which confronts it. These existing sanctions, such as criminal penalties, revocation of licenses, and issuance of cease and desist orders, are normally too drastic for the relatively minor types of offenses involved, and too cumbersome and time-consuming considering the multitude of violations that occur. In aggravated cases these more drastic sanctions are, of course, available for use. However, the Commission is reluctant in any event to take action which will result in depriving a licensee of radio when it is being used for safety purposes, such as on an aircraft or a ship.

Congress has recognized the need for this type of forfeiture authority and has given it to various Government agencies. Thus, Congress has made a broad provision for civil penalties for violations of the Civil Aeronautics Act and certain regulations issued under that act (49 U.S.C. 62). And see, also, title 8, United States Code, section 1321 et seq. (aliens and nationality); title 46, United States Code, section 526 (o) and (p) (motorboats); title 49, United States Code, section 181(b) (aircraft); title 49, United States Code, section 322(h) (motor carriers); and title 49, United States Code, section 621 (inland waterways and air carriers). Moreover, Congress has already given such authority to the Federal Communications Commission, with respect to common carriers under title II of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, and also as to those ships which are required to carry radio equipment pursuant to the provisions of part II and part III of title III of that act. (47 U.S.C., 351–364 and 381–336.)

The proposal provides that forfeiture liability shall attach only for a willful, negligent, or repeated violation of the provisions enumerated in the new section 508 to be added to the Communications Act. It further fixes a maximum forfeiture liability of $100 for the violation of the provisions of any one paragraph of the proposed section 508 and an overall maximum liability of $500 for all violations of such section occurring within 90 days prior to the date a notice of apparent liability is sent. The Commission is required to give a notice of apparent liability to such person or send it to him by registered mail and to set forth therein facts which indicate apparent liability. The person so notified of apparent liability is given the right to show cause in writing why he should not be held liable and to request a personal interview with an official of the Commission at the field office of the Commission nearest to that person's place of residence.

Procedural safeguards are available to a person charged with forfeiture liability. Not only has he the right, under section 5(d) of the Communications Act (47 U.S.C. 155(d)) to request a review of Commission action taken, but by the extension to the new proposal of the remission and mitigation provisions of section 504(b) of the Communications Act (47 U.S.C. 504(b)) he is afforded a further opportunity to show cause why he should not be held liable. Should such person refuse to pay the amount of a forfeiture as finally determined, he could, by such refusal, cause the United States, if it so elects, to institute a civil suit against him, as provided in sec. 504(a) of the Communications Act (47 U.S.C. 504(a)) thereby further contesting the validity of the asserted forfeiture liability. Thus, adequate safeguards would be available for the protection of the legal rights of a person against whom a forfeiture liability is asserted.

S. 1738. A bill to amend section 5(c) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, to redefine the duties and functions of the review staff.

EXPLANATION OF PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO SUBSECTION (c) OF SECTION 5 OF THE COMMUNICATIONS ACT OF 1934, AS AMENDED (47 U.S.C. 155(c)

The purpose of the proposed amendment to section 5(c) of the Communications Act is to afford the Commission greater discretion in the utilization of the review staff provided for by that section. This would be accomplished without allowing recommendations to be made concerning the final disposition of any adjudicatory proceeding, for final decisions in adjudicatory matters would continue to be prepared in accordance with the specific directions of the Commission. The suggested changes to 5(c) would be accomplished by deleting the fourth sentence of the present section and substituting the proposed new language.

The principal advantage of the amendment would be to expedite the disposition of adjudicatory cases by permitting the professional staff of opinions and review to assist the Commission more fully than at present on those matters which do not involve final disposition thus allowing the Commissioners to concentrate their attention on the important questions of policy, law, and fact coming before them. This would be accomplished by permitting the review staff to advise the Commission on the disposition of interlocutory matters and to prepare legal and factual analysis for the Commission's assistance in all adjudicatory matters. In connection with the changes affecting interlocutory questions, it is believed that the amendment would be administratively beneficial by contributing to the more expeditious handling of these matters.

STATEMENT OF COMMISSIONER ROBERT T. BARTLEY

In my opinion, the Commission's proposal to amend section 5(c) of the Communications Act of 1934 would still limit the assistance of the review staff to a far greater degree than is either necessary or desirable. It should be borne in mind that this staff has the sole function of assisting the Commission in adjudicatory cases and that it is directly responsible to the Commisisoners—it does not investigate, it does not prosecute. To deprive the Commission of the full assistance of which this staff is capable is both wasteful and inefficient. To permit this staff to assist the Commission fully in its decisional process would not in any way deprive any party to a case of any inherent right and could contribute to speedier action.

Therefore, I do not agree with the second sentence of the Commission's proposed bill.

STATEMENT OF COMMISSIONER FREDERICK W. FORD

I believe that section 5(c) is unduly restrictive, unnecessary, and should be repealed. Section 5(c) of the Administrative Procedure Act relating to the separation of functions of the staff, contains all of the safeguards required.

S. 1739. A bill to amend the Communications Act of 1934 in order to authorize the licensing of certain rebroadcasting stations constructed without a permit under such act.

(The letter accompanying Senate bill 1739 is as follows:)

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION,
Washington, D.C., April 13, 1959.

Hon. WARREN G. MAGNUSON,
Chairman, Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: As you are aware, in numerous small communities and outlying areas beyond the direct range of television broadcast stations, television programs are made available to local residents by means of small low-powered repeaters. These devices, located at favorable reception points on hills or mountains, pick up television signals from distant stations, amplify them and retransmit them to nearby home receivers which are unable to obtain satisfactory direct reception.

Hitherto, the Commission, cognizant of certain potentials VHF repeaters have for interference to each other and for interference to other broadcast and nonbroadcast services, has confined the authorization of repeater devices to so-called translators operating in the UHF band. UHF translators offer several distinct advantages, both as to the limitation of interference and as to the range of useful service of good grade.

Prior to and during the pendency of lengthy proceedings devoted to a study of conditions under which it might be desirable to authorize repeaters in the VHF band, numerous VHF repeaters have been installed, without FCC authorization. The Commission has direct knowledge of over 300, and it has been estimated that the total number is substantially greater. In December 1958, the Commission announced the conclusion, to which it had come at that time, that the advantages of UHF translators so outweighed the considerations favoring the authorization of VHF repeaters, that it would be in the public interest to confine repeaters to the UHF band.

Since that time, however, the Commission has had the matter under continuing review, and has received additional field data which indicate that, under certain conditions, VHF repeater operations may be conducted with less actual interference to other signals than had previously been calculated. Aware of the useful purpose served by these devices, and taking into account the investments made in those which have been installed, the Commission is now of the opinion that, if the Communications Act is appropriately amended, VHF repeaters could be licensed under conditions which will insure due protection to other users of the radio spectrum including aerial navigation services.

Under a longstanding construction by the Federal Communications Commission of section 319 of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, which has been upheld by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, the Commission is prohibited (with minor exceptions not relevant here) from authorizing the use of facilities for the broadcasting of signals by radio if such facilities were constructed prior to the grant of a construction permit therefor (WJIV, Inc., 231 F. 2d, 725; 97 U.S. Appeals D.C. 391).

Accordingly the Commission is separately recommending that section 319(d) of the Communications Act of 1934 be amended to permit the Commission to grant licenses to stations already constructed if they are engaged solely in rebroadcasting signals, if such stations were constructed on or before January 1, 1959, and if the Commission finds that the public interest, convenience, and necessity would be served thereby.

In addition the Commission is separately recommending the amendment of section 318 of the act to clarify the statutory requirements concerning the operation of equipment (operator requirements) used for the broadcasting of signals by radio, including television repeater equipment. The text of the proposed amendments and accompanying explanations are enclosed with this letter.

Our study of the interference problem posed by the use of repeaters in the VHF band indicates the potential of interference to the following services: to other VHF repeaters, to the reception of TV programs by regular television broadcast stations operating in the VHF band, to FM radio broadcast stations, and to nonbroadcast services, such as public safety (police and forestry) services using frequencies between television channels 4 and 5 and to the operation of the aerial navigation services employing radio fan markers on 75 megacycles, also between channels 4 and 5. Taking all of these considerations into account the Commission believes that the following minimum requirements should be imposed upon the operation of VHF repeaters:

(a) Transmission of the rebroadcast signals on a channel other than the channel on which the signal is received.

(b) Maximum power output limited to no more than 1 watt.

(c) Facilities for on and off remote control.

(d) The selection of transmitting frequency, appropriate minimum mileage separation from cochannel transmitters of regular television broadcast stations (still to be determined), and such other operating conditions as may be needed to insure reasonable protection to regular broadcast and nonbroadcast services.

VHF repeaters would, in addition, come within the provisions of section 325(a) of the Communications Act requiring the permission of the originating station for the rebroadcast of programs.

In order to afford ample opportunity for the modification of existing VHF repeaters which do not at present meet the foregoing requirements the Commission contemplates allowing a reasonable period—up to 1 year—to bring existing VHF repeaters into conformity with these requirements.

Exceptionally, however, the Commission feels that in order to minimize any possible hazard to aerial navigation it is desirable to take early steps toward the elimination of the operations on channels 4 and 5 of VHF repeaters or boosters which retransmit on the same channel as the incoming signal. The object would be to eliminate the possibility of such a VHF repeater receiving, amplifying, and transmitting signals of aerial fan markers operating on 75 megacycles, with the possible result that an aircraft pilot might be misled as to his true position. While the possibilities of this occurring appear relatively remote, and while it would require a combination of circumstances in addition to the retransmission of the fan marker signal to create a serious hazard, the Commission believes that the earliest possible elimination from channels 4 and 5 of VHF repeaters which transmit on the incoming frequency is highly desirable. Although our information is not complete, such data as are available indicate that probably fewer than 5 percent of all existing VHF repeaters would fall into this category.

If any additional comments or information are desired, would you kindly let us know?

By direction of the Commission.

JOHN C. DOERFER,
Chairman.

EXPLANATION OF PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO SECTION 319(D) OF THE COMMUNICATIONS ACT OF 1934 (47 U.S.C. 319(D))

The development of television service throughout the United States has been hampered by the fact that in general the signals travel in a line of sight pattern. As a result, in mountainous terrain there are some valleys where a signal is not obtainable by ordinary home equipment and some of the communities are too small to support their own station.

The Commission has been endeavoring to work out a satisfactory plan for authorizing service to these isolated areas. In the meantime some communities have devised their own systems. Under the Communications Act of 1934, however, the Commission is prohibited from issuing licenses for facilities if those facilities have been constructed before the Commission granted a construction permit (47 U.S.C. 319(d)).

In addition to the engineering problems involved as to just what system would probably be best and therefore appropriately authorized, there were considerable doubts as to the legal authority of the Commission over small local facilities relaying signals from larger stations. Concurrently with the litigation testing the Commission's legal authority, the Commission was making an effort to work out a satisfactory plan for service to these smaller communities. Under these circumstances the Commission feels that a fair amount of liberality is indicated in permitting the authorization now of facilities constructed when the ultimate jurisdiction of the Commission and the terms under which it might grant licenses were in a state of flux.

Accordingly the Commission recommends that section 319(d) of the Communications Act of 1934 be amended to permit the Commission to grant licenses to stations already constructed if they are engaged solely in rebroadcasting signals, if such stations were constructed on or before January 1, 1959, and if the Commission finds that the public interest, convenience, and necessity would be served thereby.

S. 1740. A bill to amend section 202(b) of the Communications Act of 1934 in order to expand the Federal Communication Commission's regulatory authority under such section.

EXPLANATION OF PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF SECTION 202(B) OF THE COMMUNICATIONS ACT OF 1934, AS AMENDED (47 U.S.C. 202(B))

The purpose of the proposed amendment is to give the Federal Communications Commission legislative authority to regulate charges and services of common carriers for the use of microwave and other point-to-point radio circuits along with the use of wires in chain broadcasting or incidental to radio communication of any kind. The Commission's present authority in this respect is now confined by section 202(b) of the act to the use of wires for such purposes.

Since the enactment of the Communications Act in 1934, there have been technical developments in the use of microwave and other high frequencies that have led to the increasing use of point-to-point radio as a substitute for and a supplement to the use of wires in chain broadcasting. At the present time such point-to-point radio is widely used by common carriers in providing circuits for network broadcasting, studio-to-transmitter links, and remote pickup and control circuits for various types of radio stations. Had such facilities been perfected and in wide use in 1934 when the Communications Act was adopted, it is reasonable to believe that Congress would have included authority for their regulation also in subsection (b) of section 202 of that act. Said subsection (b) was a new provision in radio law that was incorporated in the Communications Act of 1934, "to make doubly sure that charges for wires in connection with chain broadcasting are within the jurisdiction of the Commission." (See the remarks of Representative RAYBURN in the House of Representatives on June 2, 1934, in opening the debate in the House on S. 3285, the Communications Act of 1934, 78 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD 10313.)

The Commission interpreted this section in 1936 in Capital City Telephone Co. (3 FCC 189) in connection with a claim of that company for exemption from certain regulatory requirements as a connecting carrier under section 2(b)(2) of the Communications Act (47 U.S.C. 152(b)(2)). The company was at the time furnishing to a radio station certain wire lines for broadcasting purposes, which lines were located wholly within the State of Missouri. The Commission held that Congress, in enacting section 202(b), had clothed the Commission with jurisdiction over charges and services for wire lines used in chain broadcasting and other radio communication, even though the wires themselves were wholly within a State, since the complete transmission, wire and radio, was an interstate communication.

Although under section 202(b) it would appear that the Commission's jurisdiction in this field is limited to regulation of charges and services for the use of wires alone, certain carriers have continued to file tariffs with the Commission governing this service, whether by wire or radio. The proposed amendment will remove any question as to the Commission's regulatory authority over such charges insofar as radio facilities are concerned.

The proposed amendment is, therefore, recommended because of the increasing use of such radio facilities interchangeably with wire service in providing network service and control circuits furnished by common carriers to broadcasters and other radio users. It is further recommended as necessary and desirable because such amendment will give a clear statutory direction to the Federal Comunications Commission of its responsibility in this field.

S. 1741. A bill to amend the Communications Act of 1934 with respect to the requirements for operating transmitting apparatus.

(The explanation accompanying Senate bill 1741 is as follows:)

EXPLANATION OF PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO SECTION 318 OF THE COMMUNICATIONS ACT OF 1934, AS AMENDED

The Communications Act of 1934, as amended, now provides in section 318 that the actual operation of transmitting equipment licensed under the act should be carried on only by persons holding an operator's license issued under the act. The Commission is given discretion to waive that requirement except for certain named categories. In recent years the art of transmitting has advanced tremendously and the Commission believes that it should have greater statutory latitude as to the requirements for operators of transmitting equipment engaged in broadcasting. For instance, at present there may be an inference in section 318 that the operator be in personal attendance, whereas in some situations the Commission believes that it is enough for the operator to turn the equipment on, have it operated under his general control but not be in personal attendance. This situation is particularly true of transmitters engaged solely in rebroadcasting, such as the so-called boosters in smaller communities in mountainous terrain, especially out west.

Accordingly, the Commission recommends that section 318 of the Communications Act be amended to remove the explicit requirement that transmitting equipment of broadcast stations be operated by licensed operators.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION ACT, RELATING TO PROHIBITION OF CERTAIN PRACTICES IN COMMERCE

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, by request, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to amend the Federal Trade Commission Act so as to prohibit certain practices in commerce by any manufacturer or producer who distributes his product in commerce through his own retail outlets, direct to consumers and also through other retail outlets.

I am introducing this bill at the request of the National Federation of Independent Business. George J. Burger, vice president of the federation, advises me that a poll of the national membership of the federation, which comprises more than 125,000 independent establishments, showed that 86 percent favored this proposal, 11 percent opposed, 3 percent did not vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1742) to amend the Federal Trade Commission Act so as to prohibit certain practices in commerce by any manufacturer or producer who distributes his product in commerce through his own retail outlets, direct to consumers and also through other retail outlets, introduced by Mr. MAGNUSON, by request, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

PATRIOTIC EDUCATION WEEK

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a joint resolution designating the 7-day period beginning on the third Monday of October of each year as Patriotic Education Week. This joint resolution is a companion to House Joint Resolution 343, which was introduced in the House of Representatives on April 16 by the able Representative from the Fifth Congressional District of New Jersey, PETER FRELINGHUYSEN, JR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 91) designating the 7-day period beginning on the third Monday in October of each year as Patriotic Education Week, introduced by Mr. CASE of New Jersey, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

DEVELOPMENT OF INTERNATIONAL EDUCATIONAL PROGRAMS OUTSIDE CONTINENTAL UNITED STATES

Mr. McGEE. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and Senators MANSFIELD, MOSS, HARTKE, MAGNUSON, CLARK, DOUGLAS, GRUENING, HART, JAVITS, KENNEDY, RANDOLPH, MURRAY, MCCARTHY, NEUBERGER, SPARKMAN, HUMPHREY, YARBOROUGH, WILEY, KEFAUVER, MORSE, HENNINGS, CARROLL, YOUNG of Ohio, JORDAN, CANNON, MCNAMARA, WILLIAMS of New Jersey, and CHAVEZ, I submit, for appropriate reference, a concurrent resolution, the purpose of which is to encourage the development of colleges and other technical institutions of higher learning outside the continental United States. Representative BYRON JOHNSON, of Colorado, is today submitting a similar concurrent resolution in the House of Representatives.

It has been our feeling that in our programs in the field of international education, while through the Fulbright program, the exchange of students, and other programs, we have greatly aided the understanding of people, we can do much more.

A good many of our students are reluctant to come back home after participating in such programs. They find studying abroad very much to their liking. On the other hand, the number of students who can be brought to the United States for technical training is obviously limited. We know, too, that the patience of the people of the world is not very great. For better or worse, they are moving rapidly. One of the best ways to grapple with the problem of human impatience is to speed up the educative process in their lands. For that reason, it is believed that if we could encourage, through the use of foreign currencies, and through the United Nations organization itself, the development in other countries, of institutions of higher learning, such as teachers' colleges, for example, we could facilitate the achievement of the end without too much disorder.

The foreign policy of the United States has for some time suffered criticism for being directed toward the maintenance of an unsatisfactory status quo. Administration measures have often seemed to be motivated only by the desire to "counterpunch." The dramatic changes which are taking place throughout the world have made this method bankrupt. It is not enough merely to counterpunch, and it is up to the majority in this session of Congress to provide the administration and the Nation with the new leadership which is so necessary if the United States is to play a constructive role in the great events of the future.

The McGee-Johnson concurrent resolution is an attempt to seize the initiative in an especially critical area of world affairs. Its sponsors feel it has the following points in its favor:

First. It calls upon the United Nations to develop the detailed plan upon which this international education program would be built. In this way, it will be possible for the nations which make up this organization to work together, and the program developed will be free of the stigma of having been "Made in America."

Second. The concurrent resolution provides for the use of the inconvertible foreign currencies which are piling up in various countries of the world from appropriations made for other purposes. It should be possible to use these currencies for a constructive program, and their use would avoid, we hope, at least the immediate necessity for direct appropriations.

Third. The present method of bringing students from underdeveloped areas to study and receive training in this and other Western nations often fails in its purpose either because the student wishes to stay here when his training is completed, or because he has serious trouble adjusting to living and working conditions in his native country when he returns to put his training to use. These difficulties could be avoided by training the needed engineers, teachers, and other professional personnel required for these areas in regional schools closer to their homes.

Fourth. The presence of qualified technical and professional faculties in these areas, conducting and directing scholarly research, would provide a source of consultation and assistance on technical aid and other projects. It would also make possible a more objective and constructive appraisal of such things as project loan proposals.

Fifth. Since the areas of the world which do not now have adequate systems of primary and secondary education cannot be expected to develop them without large numbers of qualified teachers, and since these areas cannot be expected to develop strong economies without competent professional people in other fields, the time is now ripe for the development of an international educational program which is acceptable because sponsored and planned by the United Nations, and which is feasible because of the willingness of Congress to propose it and to accept a reasonable share of the cost of bringing it to fruition.

For these reasons, I submit the concurrent resolution, and I ask unanimous consent that it may lie on the desk through April 24, in order to give other Senators an opportunity to cosponsor it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 24) was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Whereas the United States has benefited greatly from the exchange of students between our own country and other countries through the Fulbright Acts and Smith-Mundt Acts; and

Whereas, the other nations of the world have in recent years experienced remarkable growth in the number of persons trained through the operations of these and similar programs; and

Whereas, increasing the level of education and attainment of the peoples of the world is the most productive investment that the nations of the world can make for the well-being of all mankind; and

Whereas, international educational programs enhance international understanding and thereby promote the cause of peace; and

Whereas, the cause of peace can be served by increasing cooperation among peoples of other nations in the pursuit of educational attainment; and

Whereas, many nations or regions of the world not now possessing universities, colleges and technical institutes are now on the threshold of readiness to create and operate such universities, colleges and technical institutes: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States hereby expresses its interest in encouraging the development outside continental United States of international educational programs, both graduate, including regional graduate schools, and undergraduate, including teachers colleges, technical institutes, as well as other colleges and universities; and be it further

Resolved, That the Congress hereby recommends that the U.S. Government encourage the United Nations Organization through its special fund or otherwise to undertake to develop a plan for international educational cooperation that would best serve the needs of the several member countries, as well as the cause of world peace and international economic and social development; and be it further

Resolved, That the Congress hereby expresses its willingness to accept a reasonable share of the cost of bringing into operation certain aspects of such a plan through the use of foreign currencies available for these uses, or otherwise as may prove suitable and desirable.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959—AMENDMENTS

Mr. GOLDWATER submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to the bill S. 1555) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. PROUTY submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to Senate bill 1555, supra, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. HOLLAND submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him to Senate bill 1555, supra, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. McCLELLAN submitted amendments, intended to be proposed by him, to Senate bill 1555, supra, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

Mr. CASE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I submit an amendment, intended to be proposed by me to Senate bill 1555, and ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

Senate bill 1555, as reported, permits the Secretary of Labor to exempt unions of less than 200 members and gross annual receipts of less than $20,000 from its financial reporting requirements. Secretary of Labor Mitchell has opposed this exemption, pointing out that all union members should have governmental protection of union funds, regardless of whether they are part of a small or a large union.

The Secretary pointed out that in the disclosures of the McClellan committee "some of the very difficult problems" and "some of the messier situations arose in these small unions." He emphasized that some of the most corrupt unions, such as the Johnnie Dio paper locals, could, under some future Secretary of Labor, evade the financial reporting requirements.

The argument has been made that these reporting requirements would be burdensome to the smaller union; but the bill already contains a provision giving the Secretary of Labor ample authority to prescribe simplified reports for small unions and small employers where more detailed reports would be burdensome.

My amendment would close a significant loophole in the effective protection of union members and the general public. I believe all union members should be given equal treatment under the law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

PAY AND CLASSIFICATION SYSTEM FOR EMPLOYEES OF SENATORS—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF RESOLUTION

Under authority of the order of the Senate of April 15, 1959, the name of Senator BUSH was added as an additional cosponsor of the resolution (S. Res. 102) directing the Committee on Rules and Administration to report a pay and classification system for employees of Senators, submitted by Mr. NEUBERGER (for himself, Mr. CARROLL, Mr. DOUGLAS, and Mr. HUMPHREY) on April 15, 1959.

NOTICE OF HEARING ON NOMINATION OF GEORGE M. JOHNSON TO BE A MEMBER OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS COMMISSION

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, on behalf of the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], I announce that the Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights of the Committee on the Judiciary will conduct a hearing on the nomination of George M. Johnson, of California, vice Ernest J. Wilkins, deceased, to be a member of the Civil Rights Commission, at 10 a.m., Tuesday, April 21, 1959, in room 1202, New Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

Public announcement of this hearing was made last week during the subcommittee's hearings on pending Federal civil rights legislation.

NOTICE OF HEARINGS ON BILLS TO STRENGTHEN ANTISUBVERSIVE LEGISLATION

Mr. DODD. Mr. President, I wish to remind the Senate that some of the most important legislative proposals which this Congress will consider will be the subject of hearings scheduled to begin today.

These are the 12 or more bills designed to strengthen antisubversive legislation, principally by remedying certain defects which the Supreme Court has indicated in a number of decisions during recent years.

As I have previously informed Senators, I have been asked by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], chairman of the Judiciary Committee and of its Subcommittee on Internal Security, to preside over these hearings. I do not feel, therefore, that I should express my own views as to the language of any of these proposals.

However, I wish to point out to my colleagues that if the Congress desires, as it has so often indicated during the past two decades, to protect the Government of this Nation, and, indeed, the people of the United States, against the obvious efforts of the Communist conspiracy to destroy the one and enslave the other, as it has in the case of other nations and peoples, then it is necessary to make sure that the necessary legislation be adequate and effective. This I understand to be the purpose of the bills to be considered, and it certainly will be the purpose of the committee in conducting these hearings.

Preparation of legislation of this type and of this importance to the whole Nation is not, in my view, the responsibility of one Member or of one subcommittee or of one committee, but should be the result of consultation among all Members of the Congress, with the best advice that can be enlisted from students of the problems at issue.

It is for this purpose that I am drawing attention again today to the fact that hearings will begin at 1:30 p.m. today. They will be held in the Judiciary Committee chamber, room 2228, New Senate Office Building. In all probability, these hearings will run a week or 10 days; then we must close the record in order to get on with the legislative process.

The subcommittee is desirous of giving every consideration to the convenience of Senators and others who wish to testify on these bills and, therefore, would appreciate as much advance notice as possible. Prepared statements may be submitted at any time before the hearings are closed, but the Senate rules require that a witness who desires to testify from a prepared statement must submit the statement 24 hours in advance of his appearance.

This hearing will consider all antisubversion legislation assigned to the subcommittee. The bills so assigned at this time are:

S. 3, by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN] and others, to establish rules of interpretation governing the effect of acts of Congress on State laws,

S. 294, by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] and others, to amend title 18, United States Code, to authorize the enforcement of State statutes prescribing criminal penalties for subversive activities.

S. 527, by the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] and others, to amend section 2385 of title 18 of the United States Code to define the term "organize" as used in that section.

S. 1646, by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], relating to espionage and censorship.

Also the several bills introduced by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND] to carry into effect recommendations of the American Bar Association for strengthening antisubversive legislation:

S. 1299, to protect the effectiveness of State antisubversive laws against unintended Federal preemption.

S. 1300, to define the term "organize" as used in the Smith Act.

S. 1301, to make full disclosure respecting loyalty to the United States a condition of Government employment.

S. 1302, to amend sections 241 and 242 of the Immigration and Nationality Act to provide protection against the subversive activities of certain aliens.

S. 1303, to amend the Immigration and Nationality Act with respect to travel in time of war or national emergency and passport procedures.

S. 1304, to broaden the application of the Summary Suspension Act of 1950.

S. 1305, to amend section 2385 of title 18 of the United States Code to make it a crime intentionally to advocate the violent overthrow of the Government of the United States or to teach the necessity, desirability, or duty of seeking to bring about such overthrow.

And the following bills which have passed the House:

H.R. 1992, to repeal section 791 of title 18, United States Code, so as to extend the application of chapter 37, title 18, relating to espionage and censorship.

H.R. 2369, to define "organize" as used in the Smith Act.

NEEDED: A SOMETHING-FOR-SOMETHING PROGRAM

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, the 86th Congress has been in session for a little more than 3 months. In that time, on three occasions, we have faced clear-cut decisions on matters affecting the Federal budget—the housing bill, the airports bill, and the depressed areas bill.

The paramount domestic issue of the day involves the Federal budget. It is discouraging to observe, therefore, that on these three major tests thus far, the Congress has gone beyond the spending requests of the administration and has upset the proposed balanced budget.

The importance of greater fiscal responsibility in these times cannot be overemphasized. In all my nearly 23 years as a U.S. Senator, there has never been a time such as today when the need for such responsibility has been so great.

THE FALSE SOMETHING-FOR-NOTHING THEORY

The basic problem before us here in the United States—as around the world—is the false fancy that government can give its individual citizens vast benefits at little or no cost.

This is the something-for-nothing theory. It takes the form of demands that every legislator bring home more than his State sent to Washington in the form of taxes.

There is a growing awareness among the public, I believe, that this something-for-nothing theory is a hollow one.

More and more people realize that mounting government costs will result either in a crushing burden of direct taxes or, if legislators are unwilling to impose the necessary direct taxes, in the more insidious indirect tax of inflation via deficit financing.

It is increasingly hazardous for those who believe in spending and more spending to ridicule the administration's attempts to keep Federal revenues within shouting distance of Federal expenditures.

Something for nothing is neither good mathematics nor good morals. I believe the time is fast approaching when it is not good politics either.

"ROBBING PAUL TO PAY PAUL"

Apparently, we shall soon be asked to vote for Federal aid to education, because, the argument runs, "poor" people in rural areas cannot stand the cost of good schools, and must have help from urban areas such as Detroit, Philadelphia, and Los Angeles.

But we have just finished passing bills for Federal aid for airports, urban renewal, and depressed areas to help such cities as, apparently, the same Detroit, Philadelphia, and Los Angeles, and others which are too "poor" to pay this cost, which now will be paid by the suddenly better-off farmers and small town citizens from the rural areas.

When the process is complete, and everyone gets through paying for what the Government has done for everyone else, we will face a rising tax burden or a widening deficit, or both.

In other words, it is quite clear that we very quickly exhaust the possibilities of robbing Peter to pay Paul, and end up robbing Paul to pay Paul.

NEW HAMPSHIRE IS LOSER

The State of New Hampshire is a consistent loser in this futile process.

Under most education proposals—and I use this only as an example—we would be taxed more than the benefits we would receive. For example, under one important education proposal, New Hampshire would, in effect, be taxed by about $531,000 a year more than the amount of Federal benefits we would receive.

Under the depressed areas proposal, we would pay for subsidies designed to lure away our own industries to other areas. There are no depressed areas whatever in the State of New Hampshire, I am happy to say.

We have little stake in urban renewal, slum clearance, or public housing. But with all our sister States we would have to help foot the bill of Federal programs in these and other fields.

We in New Hampshire are vitally concerned with human needs both within our State and throughout the country. But let us meet these needs as they come up, at the level of responsibility closest to the need—whether it be through individuals or private enterprise or local or State governments.

Let us not assume that the existence of a need automatically produces a responsibility of the Federal Government. Often that responsibility is best met by some other agency.

The Federal Treasury has no mysterious pipeline to some inexhaustible flow of funds from the moon.

Federal welfare measures must be paid in one way or another—either by direct taxes or by the subtle but cruel indirect tax of inflation which results when we spend, but fail to tax ourselves sufficiently, and thus resort to deficits.

Government has no magic resources. It can furnish people only what it has first taken away from people.

In short, there is no such thing as something for nothing.

The degree to which we have let ourselves think that human welfare can be met only by steadily rising drains on the U.S. Treasury—which means the American public—is remarkable.

THE GROWTH OF SOCIAL WELFARE

The Roosevelt administration in its first two terms spent a great deal of money on social welfare, but these expenditures were modest indeed when placed alongside the amounts flowing out in more recent years.

In 1935, Federal outlays for welfare programs were only $2 billion. Even by 1945, at the end of the war, annual welfare expenditures were only $2,272 million. But in 1950 the dollar figure rose to nearly $7 billion—a threefold increase in 5 years. By 1955, we were spending $12 billion on social welfare programs. In the year just concluded, the total had continued its dizzying ascent to $18 billion. In 1960, according to budget estimates, Federal social welfare spending will top $21 billion.

The rising tide of social welfare expenditures is shocking because it has taken place in the full prosperity of these postwar years.

In the face of record levels of production and income, improved well-being for all our people, and expanding capacity of individuals to meet their own needs, there can be no justification for such a meteoric rise in Government welfare programs.

FACTS WHICH STARTLE TAXPAYERS

If $10 million had been paid out each year from the birth of Christ down through the ages to 1960, less money would have been paid out than will be paid out this year alone.

In 1 year we are spending more on Federal welfare programs than on the purchase of aircraft, missiles, ships, and other military equipment for the Defense Department.

We are spending four times as much on Federal welfare programs as we are spending for research and development which are so vital to our national security and strength.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD a table which shows the rising levels of Federal social welfare expenditures.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Millions of dollars]

Year	Total	Direct payments	Welfare agencies
1935	2,942	2,863	79
1940	3,195	2,976	219
1945	2,272	1,814	458
1950	6,994	5,040	1,954
1955	12,210	10,421	1,789
1960 (estimated)	21,546	18,939	2,607

EXPENSES DOUBLED SINCE 1950

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, of course, we all recognize that the depression of the thirties generated a great expansion in the role of the Federal Government. We know that World War II required huge outlays in Federal funds.

But it is surprising to note that since 1950, the expenditures of the Federal Government have literally doubled again.

In the fiscal year 1950, Federal budget expenditures were $39,617,000,000. In the current fiscal year, less than 10 years later, Federal budget expenditures are estimated at $80,871,000,000.

If the efforts of the administration are not frustrated by overzealous spenders, the present level may be somewhat reduced in the next fiscal year.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a table which shows the rise in Federal budget expenditures since World War II.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Federal budget expenditures, 1946–59

[Millions of dollars]

Fiscal year	Total	Major national security	Other
1946	60,448	43,207	17,241
1947	39,032	14,372	24,660
1948	33,069	11,771	22,298
1949	39,507	12,907	26,600
1950	39,617	13,009	26,608
1951	44,058	22,444	21,614
1952	65,408	43,976	21,432
1953	74,274	50,363	23,911
1954	67,772	46,904	20,868
1955	64,570	40,626	23,944
1956	66,540	40,641	25,899
1957	69,433	43,270	26,163
1958	71,936	44,142	27,794
1959	80,871	46,120	34,751

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, the ideas for new spending proposals continue to pour forth.

Last year, congressional action led to a veto by the President of an airports bill of $437 million, a depressed areas bill of $280 million, and a rivers and harbors bill of $191 million.

This year in the Senate we have already passed a $465 million airports bill, a $390 million depressed areas bill, and a housing bill which exceeds by more than $1 billion the administration's determination of housing needs.

More legislation is waiting in the wings—a multibillion dollar education program, for example, a $1 billion community facilities bill, and others.

THE ARGUMENTS FOR SPENDING

Those who adhere to the "something-for-nothing" theory advance a barrage of arguments to justify their position. Most of these arguments are transparent and are easily recognized for what they are. I should like to single out three specific arguments which we often hear:

First. That we must raise Federal spending, to promote more rapid economic growth.

Second. That we must raise Federal spending because a strong defense is more important than a balanced budget.

Third. That we must raise Federal spending because, after all, most of the programs under consideration will not affect this year's budget or the budget for fiscal year 1960.

These are arguments which have a somewhat plausible, but shallow, ring. Indeed, most of those who make these arguments, I am sure, do so in all sincerity.

WHY ARGUMENTS DO NOT HOLD WATER

In my judgment, however, these are not valid arguments; and I intend to show why.

First, there is the argument that we must raise Federal spending, to promote more rapid economic growth.

Of course, I am in favor of economic growth. I know of no Senator who is not proud of the vigorous economic growth for which America is famous. Our free economic system has made possible a great rise in living standards for the many.

But I want our growth to continue in terms of real productive power, and not simply in terms of more money spending and inflation. The growth of the United States should be a vast broadening and deepening of the economic base, a general lifting of living standards—not a hothouse inflationary spurt which cannot be sustained.

If we want real economic growth, let us recognize that it is going to come from private-capital formation, investment in new and more efficient work-saving machines, and more productive organization of labor. Simply spending more at the Federal Government level may raise total output on a one-shot basis, but it will not accelerate economic growth.

It is pointless to try by artificial means to force a progress that is really hindered by the very means to which we are asked to turn.

EXAMPLE OF THE THEATER SEAT CUSHIONS

In effect, such spending measures—now for one purpose, now for another—constitute a hurried attempt to supply cushions to a few in the theater so they can see over the heads of the people in front of them, and then, to supply more cushions to the people in back of them. But this scheme can look pretty dubious when everyone is supplied with a cushion.

Second, there is the argument that a strong defense is more important than a balanced budget.

This is a false issue. Of course, national security is more important than any other objective. But if we need to spend more on national security, then we can afford to pay the full cost in direct taxes. The alternative is to pay the price in the hidden tax of inflation—the cruelest, most regressive of government taxes. If we want to balance the budget, we must do so at whatever level is dictated by the needs of the times—the real needs, not all the fancied needs and inflated demands on the Treasury which every special pleader may think of.

Some of those who would jack up defense spending overnight show no genuine understanding of defense problems. They would have us spend billions on some types of missiles which could be outmoded overnight by the advance of military technology even before production was fully completed. In modern preparedness, one of the first requirements is to keep up with the rapid pace of weapons research. Billions spent on arms which will be obsolete in a matter of months are billions wasted.

NO CONFLICT BETWEEN BALANCED BUDGET AND DEFENSE

There is no conflict between a balanced budget and adequate national security. The American people can afford adequate national security. The American people can face up to their own defense needs, whatever they may be; but the American people can also face up to the need for fiscal responsibility at a time of rising prosperity. In fact, I believe that the American people will insist that our political leaders face up to the requirements of fiscal integrity—which at this time means a balanced budget.

There can be no real national security without fiscal stability.

Our need is for a modern and ready defense—strong in defense of our homeland, and strong in the power to retaliate against any aggressor.

The administration's defense budget was designed to represent what we need for adequate national security. It is also consistent with a balanced over-all Federal budget. There is no conflict between these objectives. On the contrary, they are mutually complementary objectives; one is essential to the other.

THE DISTURBING ARGUMENT ADVANCED BY SPENDERS

Finally, the most disturbing argument now gaining currency is that we should pay no attention to Federal spending programs if they do not directly affect this year's budget or the budget for fiscal year 1960.

Let us take a close look at this argument.

Earlier in the year we considered urban renewal legislation. We were confronted with many proposals for committing the Federal Government to literally billions of dollars for 6-year or 10-year programs. In these proposals, actual spending would not have taken place, in some cases, for from 15 to 20 years.

Yet some proponents actually contended that because these proposals did not involve spending in this fiscal year, we did not need to consider the impact on the budget. The argument was made that the need for fiscal restraint did not apply to these proposals.

Mr. President, I am not against urban renewal, per se. But if urban renewal spending is worthwhile, we should be quite willing to tax ourselves for the full cost. If we are going to undertake such vast programs, we should be willing to face up to the costs.

Last year, when the President vetoed an area redevelopment bill, the claim was made that the administration could not object to the dollars involved because they had not yet been appropriated.

The irony is that when we start paying these multi-billion-dollar bills 2 or 3 or 5 or 10 years hence, all of the same proponents will stand around and will say, "We can't cut the budget here. The money was committed years ago. There is nothing we can do about it now."

In other words, the argument is that we should ignore the budgetary impact of these delayed spending programs now—and we should also ignore their budgetary impact later. In brief, this means we would never face up to the cost of these programs.

There are in the 1959 budget and in the 1960 budget, spending items which flow out of legislation passed in earlier years.

Does anyone suggest that now, when the money is being paid out, we should go back and should reconsider the legislation enacted by an earlier Congress, and perhaps should repeal or alter it? Hardly.

The time to weigh the merits and demerits of any proposal for Federal spending is, primarily, at the time when the basic legislation is being considered. It is obvious which time is more feasible. It is next to impossible to discuss fully the pros and cons of spending on a program which is set up and running. The time to consider the pros and cons is when we set up any new program. That is the time to weigh fully and wisely the benefits and costs of any new programs. If we really believe that the benefits outweigh the costs, why should we fear a close look at the costs as well as the benefits?

A FOUR-POINT SOMETHING-FOR-SOMETHING PROGRAM

Mr. President, I propose a four-point something-for-something program. I propose that we specifically reject the theory of something-for-nothing. I propose that we pursue, instead, the far more rewarding, more genuine course of something-for-something. I think this is what the American people want.

First, let us frankly acknowledge that the Federal Government is not financially ready to underwrite any and all welfare measures which the minds of 98 Senators and 436 Members of the House of Representatives may dream up. We have limited resources. Existing sources of revenue do not provide us with any surplus with which to launch vast new programs. This is obviously not the time to pile new taxes on the burden already imposed on our people, nor is it the time to run a deficit, just as the economy is surging forward in a wave of expansion. So let us face the fact that Federal resources are limited.

Second, let us, then, recognize that we can undertake Federal spending only for items which clearly yield benefits that outweigh the costs. We must undertake items only of the highest priority.

Third, let us stop the efforts to sneak through vast spending measures without due consideration to the costs involved, in an effort to make political "quick tricks." We cannot continue to punch holes in the administration's narrowly balanced budget and siphon off $465 million here, $2.7 billion there, and $390 million there. We must stop committing ourselves for dollars we have not got, for things we do not need or for things which ought to be paid for by those who use them, through the free market mechanism.

Fourth, and finally, let us reconstruct our thinking on a something-for-something basis.

We need to recognize that we cannot undertake new programs without cost, expecting some theoretical few to foot the bill.

Instead, we must have bold, forward-looking public policies.

This is the only soundly rewarding course, as well as the only one which serves the interests of the many, and to which the great majority of our people will give their full support.

Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire.

NOMINATION OF LEWIS L. STRAUSS TO BE SECRETARY OF COMMERCE

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, on October 24, last year, President Eisenhower sent to the Senate the nomination of the Honorable Lewis L. Strauss to serve as our Secretary of Commerce.

The selection of Mr. Strauss was warmly approved by our people throughout the country. There was no question of the intent of the overwhelming membership of the Senate. It was to confirm Mr. Strauss' appointment with the due deliberation and dignity befitting his high qualifications and his already brilliant record in behalf of our Nation.

Mr. Strauss' entire life is a record of patriotism and devotion to the security and progress of America.

He began public service as an assistant to Herbert Hoover, in World War I. He possesses a total service of 32 years as an officer in the Naval Reserve, retiring with the rank of rear admiral.

Mr. Strauss has served in assignments of great importance under three Presidents, and all three have praised his great ability and dedication in carrying forward the duties placed upon him.

TWO MOMENTOUS DECISIONS

He was a special assistant in the Navy Department, under Mr. Roosevelt. He was appointed by Mr. Truman to be a member of the first Atomic Energy Commission; and in the period that followed, Mr. Strauss brought about two momentous decisions that proved vital to the security of the United States. The first was the establishment of the long-range detection system which first warned us, in 1949, that the Soviet Union had achieved atomic-weapon capability.

The second was our determination to go ahead with the development of workable hydrogen bombs. He fought for the latter decision, in the face of very great opposition. Looking back, now, at the Soviet Union's rapid progress in this field, the American people know that our early movement into hydrogen weapons has preserved peace in the world.

In more recent years, as Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission, under President Eisenhower, Mr. Strauss has made historic contributions both to our security and to the peaceful use of atoms for the advancement of mankind.

His many other responses to calls for unselfish public service, his long background of business experience, and his deep integrity are well known to the Senate and to the American people.

In view of all these facts, I have been shocked and saddened more than I can say by the manner in which action to confirm his appointment has been conducted.

I think it unnecessary to state that I have always held deep respect for the way in which the U.S. Senate carries on its business. The traditional honor and dignity and probity of this body are sources of great pride and great inspiration.

HIGHLY DECORATED

I am definitely disturbed in the action of those who have been party to delaying the confirmation of this Cabinet appointment for months; and particularly concerning a man who in 1948 was awarded the Medal of Freedom; who holds the Navy Distinguished Service Medal; who has been awarded the Legion of Merit, and a Gold Star in place of a second award, and the Army's Oak Leaf Cluster in place of a third medal—these among other decorations.

It is a perfectly legitimate and necessary function of the Senate to inquire into the experience, the record and basic opinions of men nominated to high public office. But we should not let this deteriorate into a campaign to impugn the proven integrity of a distinguished citizen, or to embarrass and harass him.

ACTION NOW, NECESSARY AND VITAL

It is highly important that action be taken in the Strauss nomination, not alone for the dignity of the Senate, but so that fair treatment will be accorded Mr. Strauss in reasonably quick time.

It is important because our Nation is engaged in a critical economic war declared upon us by the Communist leadership. The Department of Commerce must play a vital part in maintaining our supremacy in this conflict.

Lewis Strauss has demonstrated amply his deep awareness and understanding of the Communist threat, and, more important, his ability to generate effective measures to deal with it.

He must be permitted, at once, to enter into this great, challenging task without harassment, and with the renewed assurance of the full confidence of the American people as expressed in the confidence and cooperation of the Senate.

Let us meet our responsibility.

Let us proceed promptly to confirm the President's nomination of Lewis Strauss as Secretary of Commerce, and wish him Godspeed in his work.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRIDGES. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Will the Senator from New Hampshire tell me what the status of the nomination is? Is it still in committee?

Mr. BRIDGES. It is still in committee and still being considered by the committee, and has been for some time.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I hope the committee will see fit to report the nomination to the Senate, recommending the confirmation of the nomination, because as one Senator, I am ready to vote for him right now.

Mr. BRIDGES. I appreciate what the distinguished Senator from New Mexico has said. I think that the action of the committee on the nomination should be speedily reported and action taken by the Senate.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL subsequently said: Mr. President, this morning on the Senate floor the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] made some remarks for the RECORD with reference to the confirmation of the nomination of Admiral Strauss. I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire in that regard. It is my hope that expedited hearings on this important nomination will be had.

The hearings will start tomorrow morning at 10:30, and I hope they will be expedited.

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. I am glad to yield.

Mr. BRIDGES. I am happy to hear what the distinguished Senator from Kansas has said about the hearings starting tomorrow morning, and his expectation that the hearings will be expedited.

The Senator from Kansas is one of the most able and forthright Members of this body, and his observation on this subject is reassuring. Does the Senator from Kansas have any idea as to exactly when we may expect action?

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Since we have a positive date set for the hearings with regard to the nomination of Admiral Strauss, which will start tomorrow morning at 10:30, I am hopeful that, consistent with the work in the Senate, there will be expedited consideration. Certainly that is the hope of the minority, and I have every reason to believe it is the hope of many Members of the majority.

Mr. BRIDGES. This morning I was very happy to hear the distinguished Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ] join with the Senator from New Hampshire in urging early and favorable action on the confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Strauss. I have also been told, informally, of similar expressions on the part of many distinguished Senators on the other side of the aisle. I sincerely hope the committee will take action soon, that they will report the nomination favorably, and that the Senate will soon have an opportunity to vote for confirmation.

Mr. SCHOEPPEL. Certainly it will be the responsibility and the desire of the Senator from Kansas to do everything possible to expedite the hearings.

WAGE NEGOTIATIONS IN THE STEEL INDUSTRY

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, wage negotiations in the steel industry this summer are fraught with implications for the public interest. Mr. David J. McDonald, president of the United Steelworkers, has announced that he intends to demand a $1 billion wage increase from the steel companies. The inflationary potential of such a demand is not hard to see.

We have long ago learned that massive wage increases in an industry like steel do not come out of profits. Instead, to the extent that wage increases outrun productivity improvements, the added cost is reflected in higher prices for steel and for the multitude of products in which steel is an important component.

Furthermore, it is well known that steel wage negotiations serve as the pattern for similar if not identical increases in many other industries.

No one is against wage increases—wage increases which can be paid out of the great technological advances and improvements in productivity which American industry generates each year—but when highly powerful unions are in a position to negotiate wage increases which far exceed such improvements, no one gains anything.

The result is simply inflation, with its ruinous effects on those least able to protect themselves, and ultimately with adverse effects on the purchasing power of the wages of steelworkers themselves.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial which appeared in the Evening Star on April 13. This editorial sheds light on one important ramification of the forthcoming steel negotiations. It points out that, if Mr. McDonald failed to use his enormous power to secure a hefty wage increase, he would lose favor with the membership.

And he would be succeeded by someone who would be demanding a two-billion instead of a one-billion package.

The problem, then, is the power which now lies in the hands of unions such as the United Steelworkers. The remedy must come through legislation. In short, it is the responsibility of Congress.

As the Evening Star points out:

But when this country embarked a little more than 2 decades ago on its program to build up and strengthen the unions it succeeded beyond expectations. It created the most powerful single mechanism in our economy, a mechanism which survives only by demanding—and getting—an ever-larger slice of the total pie. The Government created this mechanism and only the Government can restrain it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the unanimous consent request?

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STEEL INDUSTRY APPEAL

Assuming its good faith, which may be assuming too much, the steel industry's no-wage-boost appeal ignores one of the salient facts of union political life. And this, simply stated, is that David J. McDonald, president of the United Steelworkers, would put his neck in the noose if he agreed to abandon higher wage demands for the coming year. Mr. McDonald is not going to hang himself in this fashion, and the steel industry knows it.

Why can't Mr. McDonald forgo a wage increase? The steelworkers are among the highest paid in the country. Although the industry is operating at near capacity many steelworkers are unemployed. High costs and foreign competition threaten the jobs of still more union members. Yet the union is talking about a billion dollar hike in the wage package. We do not believe that this makes sense from any point of view. Yet Mr. McDonald rejects the industry appeal "out of hand," and serves notice that wage demands will be pressed.

The reason, or at least one important reason, is obvious enough. Two years ago Mr. McDonald was up for reelection as union president. An unknown opponent came charging out of nowhere to challenge him, the challenge being predicated on a promise to get more for the steelworkers. To everyone's amazement, this challenger received about one-third of the vote. If Mr. McDonald, especially in response to an industry appeal, were to drop his wage demands he would be signing his own death warrant as union president. And he would be succeeded by someone who would be demanding a two-billion instead of a one-billion package.

This is a fact of union life which is ignored by the industry's appeal and by such things as Mr. Eisenhower's exhortations to hold the line. In the interest of the Nation, the line ought to be held—there is no doubt on that score. But when this country embarked a little more than two decades ago on its program to build up and strengthen the unions it succeeded beyond expectations. It created the most powerful single mechanism in our economy, a mechanism which survives only by demanding—and getting—an ever-larger slice of the total pie. The Government created this mechanism and only the Government can restrain it. There is no use appealing to the Mr. McDonalds of the union movement. Even if they wanted to, they couldn't apply the brakes and still survive.

HOW FAST "SHOULD" THE UNITED STATES GROW?

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial which appeared in Fortune magazine for April 1959. The editorial is entitled, "How Fast 'Should' the United States Grow?"

Mr. President, the subject of economic growth has been widely discussed in recent months.

In this country we have enjoyed a fabulous growth in productive capacity and in living standards for all our people. I believe that in much of the recent discussions of growth, we tend to forget what the basis of the great economic growth which we have experienced in the past is, namely, the vigor of our free-enterprise system.

As this Fortune editorial points out, many advocates of more and more Government spending are arguing that we should try to achieve a rate of economic growth of 5 percent a year. The Fortune editorial points out:

The major defect of the 5 percent dogma, by contrast, is that it would defeat its own ends by trying to do too much too soon.

The trouble with the 5 percenters' case is not that too much growth is harmful; quite the contrary is true. The more our productive capacity expands, the better able we are to meet our defense requirements and still enjoy a high and rising standard of living.

The trouble with the 5 percenters' case is not in the goal but the means. More Government spending will not necessarily expand our economic pace; it could merely divert our growth from private to public spending.

To get more rapid economic growth, we need to encourage more private capital formation. We need to accelerate industrial technology. We need inducements for massive investment in new machines and equipment by private industry.

Mr. President, I am confident that in the future we will continue to enjoy great economic gains as we have in the past.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire?

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HOW FAST "SHOULD" THE UNITED STATES GROW?

As Soviet power and audacity mount and the cold war warms up to yet another boiling point in Berlin, the growth potential of the American economy is seen more clearly than ever as one of the controlling forces of world politics. The expansion of the U.S. economy, precisely because of the much publicized (if much exaggerated) expansion of the Soviet economy, is not merely a warm subject among marketing men and economists but a burning public issue. So great are the dynamics of growth that a single percentage point in the U.S. growth rate can make a $75 billion difference, 10 years from now, in the country's economic and military power.

From the fog of argument about how fast the U.S. economy can—or should—grow, there have emerged several distinct points of view, the most sensational of which is what might be called the 5 percent school of thought. This school has looked at all "the things that must be done"—the rising needs of defense, education, roads, health, the reduction of unemployment, etc.—and has come to the conclusion that the needs can be met only if the U.S. economy expands at 5 percent a year. Probably the most articulate of the new five percenters is Leon Keyserling, Chairman of the Council on Economic Advisers under Harry Truman. But the 5 percent doctrine also turns up with increasing regularity in the rhetoric of union leaders and Democratic Congressmen. And the Republicans are not immune to its heady appeal. One of the premises of last year's Rockefeller Report on the future of the U.S. economy was that the country ought to grow by 5 percent a year.

At the other end of the spectrum is a school that is allowing itself to be labeled "3 percenters." The 3 percenters include a number of bankers and businessmen and some economists. Their leader, to judge from some of his comments on economics, is none other than the President. These generally conservative people correctly identify 5 percent with galloping inflation, and in several other respects have a good deal of wisdom on their side.

Their great error, however, is that they so often accept debate on just the terms that the 5 percenters wish, as though the only alternative to a forced 5 percent was a natural 3 percent. It is true that the long-term growth rate of the U.S. economy, averaged out over the past 50 years, has been about 3 percent. But a more significant fact is that the postwar growth rate of the U.S. economy has averaged almost 4 percent. And the postwar period, which now extends over 13 years, can no longer be dismissed as some brief aberration.

THE POWER OF 4.25

Elsewhere in this issue "The Good Uses of $750 Billion," page 104, Fortune argues that the U.S. economy can grow by a little more than 4 percent a year during the 1960's, or by 50 percent for the decade as a whole. These figures were not pulled out of a hat. The growth of any country's total production is a function of its labor force and productivity. Because the U.S. labor force will be growing faster in the 1960's than it has in several decades, man-hours worked can increase at about 1.25 percent a year—despite a shorter workweek and "frictional" unemployment. Productivity has been rising at 3 percent a year since World War II, and in the coming age of research and automation, should do at least as well. All this should add up to a national growth rate of 4.25 percent a year.

The United States that emerges from such an analysis is a land of collossal attainments and potentialities; college enrollments will increase by 50 percent by the end of the decade, with nearly half the young people of college age in college (only a third of the youth in the Soviet Union finish 10 years of school). Just by 1965 the country could increase its defense effort by about 25 percent, capital investment by about 50 percent, and consumption by about 20 percent. The U.S. economy, in short, is in a position to assume enormous military and investment burdens and still provide a swiftly rising standard of living.

TOO MUCH TOO SOON

The major defect of the 5 percent dogma, by contrast, is that it would defeat its own ends by trying to do too much too soon. The Five Percenters do not propose to squeeze any more man-hours out of the labor force than the 1.25 percent a year increase already projected. Thus the only way they can raise the country's overall growth rate to 5 percent is to force the rate of productivity increase up from the 3 percent that seems to be assured to the unnaturally high rate of 4 percent. And how could this be accomplished? Only by Government policies that would encourage (and subsidize) a vastly higher rate of capital investment than normal market considerations dictate.

Since normal market forces already promise a very high level of capital investment in the 1960's, a Government effort to jack up this level by as much as one-third would put a very heavy burden on consumption. Even if GNP expands by only 4 or 4.2 percent a year, the country's capital needs, as the accompanying article points out, will retard the growth of consumption for a few years. But if GNP is to expand at 5 percent, consumption per capita could be allowed no rise during the next 3 or 4 years. Such a totalitarian-style distortion of balanced growth probably could be achieved by sacrificing the incentives that stimulate natural balanced growth—i.e., with the Nation on a basis of limited mobilization. Partly because the price of capital goods is rising faster than other prices, moreover, only a powerful economic authority could prevent galloping inflation—and because inflation would be an easy way of disguising the declining value of real incomes, it is doubtful whether any administration would be able to resist it.

TOO LITTLE TOO LATE

The case against a 3 percent growth rate can be put briefly. Since man-hours will be increasing at about 1.25 percent a year, productivity would need to rise by less than 2 percent a year to make total national output rise by 3 percent. But all the evidence strongly suggests that productivity will continue to rise by at least 3 percent a year. If so, the only way the country could end up with an overall growth rate of 3 percent would be to accept no increase in the size of the labor force—i.e., to accept colossal increases in unemployment throughout the 1960's. This would be at least as unnatural as anything the forced-growth school is proposing, and so of course would be unthinkable as a national policy.

THE OPTIMUM IS POSSIBLE

The optimum rate of increase, the 4-plus rate, is, as we have indicated, a realistic estimate based on forces now operating in the economy. This does not mean it can come about wholly by itself. Certainly the prospect of achieving it deserves at least as much attention from the Government as the importunities of most lobbyists. But it may need nothing more from Washington than a few strokes of conservative Government policy. Since capital investment and defense together will probably have to grow a little faster than the rest of the economy in the first half of the 1960's, the Government's general policy for the 1960's should be framed to this end—i.e., to restrain a little the growth of consumption in favor of savings and capital investment.

During the next year or so, however, inflation will probably not be the chief obstacle in the way of realizing an optimum growth rate. More important is a growing manpower problem. Unemployment stands at more than 6 percent of the labor force, instead of the "normal" 4 percent, and this just as the labor force is beginning to come into its phase of rapid growth; productivity, still recovering from its recession setback, is rising at an abnormally high rate. For the time being, therefore, severe credit restrictions (especially if combined, as a few of the doughtiest inflation-fighters have proposed, with sizable Federal budget surpluses) may not add up to the best medicine for the country. Such preventives need to be used very gradually, as events dictate.

A 4 percent growth rate, of course, is not ordained by Heaven. Any number of circumstances may arise to reduce the rate somewhat—or, what is just more possible, to increase it a little. But the United States can realize its immense potentialities, without coercion or distortion, if it neither underestimates its powers nor tries to push them too hard.

SANCTUARY IN THE UNITED STATES FOR DALAI LAMA

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, America has a long and honorable history of offering asylum to the victims of persecution, aggression, and tyranny. It may be that the Dalai Lama of Tibet will not want to depart from the continent of Asia, where his destiny has been forged. But should there be any desire on his part to live in the Western World, I urge our Government to make available to him a refuge and sanctuary in the United States from the ruthless descent of the Chinese Communists on his little mountain kingdom.

All too infrequently of late have we been identified with the fate of those who are the targets of tyranny, and this is an opportunity for us to cement our ties with one whose people have suffered cruelly at the hands of the Communist invaders. Our record with respect to admitting Hungarian refugees is one which is more comprised—alas—of words than deeds, so the Tibetan tragedy may be a further opportunity, although, of course, with only a handful of people involved so far as flight from their homeland is concerned.

Mr. President I believe the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD should contain the statement of the Dalai Lama regarding the broken promises and shattered pledges made by the Chinese Reds, as a warning to other lands which might put faith in such blandishments, and I ask unanimous consent that the Dalai Lama's statement appear in the RECORD. This is the version which was published in the New York Times of April 19, 1959, as translated via the services of the Reuters News Agency from Tezpur, in India.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEXT OF STATEMENT ISSUED BY DALAI LAMA

TEZPUR, INDIA, April 18.—Following is the official translation of the text of a statement issued today on behalf of the Dalai Lama on his arrival here:

"It has always been accepted that the Tibetan people are different from the Han people of China.

"There has always been a strong desire for independence on the part of the Tibetan people. Throughout history this has been asserted on numerous occasions.

"Sometimes the Chinese Government has imposed their suzerainty on Tibet, and at other times Tibet has functioned as an independent country.

"In any event, at all times, even when the suzerainty of China was imposed, Tibet remained autonomous in control of its internal affairs.

"In 1951, under pressure of the Chinese Government, 17-point agreement was made between China and Tibet. In that agreement the suzerainty of China was accepted as there was no alternative left to the Tibetans.

"AUTONOMY PLEDGE CITED

"But even in the agreement it was stated that Tibet would enjoy full autonomy. Though the control of external events was to be in the hands of the Chinese Government it was agreed that there would be no interference by the Chinese Government with the Tibetan religion and customs and her internal administration.

"In fact, after the occupation of Tibet by the Chinese armies, the Tibetan Government did not enjoy any measure of autonomy, even in internal matters, and the Chinese Government exercised full powers in Tibetan affairs.

"In 1956 a preparatory committee was set up for Tibet with the Dalai Lama as chairman and the Panchen Lama as vice chairman and General Chang Kuo-hua as the representative of the Chinese Government.

"In practice even this body had little power and decisions in all important matters were taken by the Chinese authorities.

"The Dalai Lama and his Government tried their best to adhere to the 17-point agreement, but the interference of the Chinese authorities persisted. By the end of 1955 a struggle had started in the Kham Province and this assumed serious proportions in 1956. In the consequential struggle the Chinese armed forces destroyed a large number of monasteries.

"LAMAS ARE KILLED

"Many lamas were killed and a large number of monks and officials were taken and employed on the construction of roads in China, and as the interference in the exercise of religious freedom increased the relation of Tibetans with China became openly strained from the early part of February 1959.

"The Dalai Lama had agreed a month in advance to attend a cultural show in the Chinese headquarters and the date was suddenly fixed for the 10th of March. The people of Lhasa became apprehensive that some harm might be done to the Dalai Lama and as a result about 10,000 people gathered around the Dalai Lama's summer palace at Norbulingka and physically prevented the Dalai Lama from attending the function.

"Thereafter the people themselves decided to raise a bodyguard for the protection of the Dalai Lama. Large crowds of Tibetans went about the streets of Lhasa demonstrating against the Chinese rule in Tibet. Two days later thousands of Tibetan women held demonstrations protesting against the Chinese authority.

"In spite of this demonstration from the people, the Dalai Lama and his Government endeavored to maintain friendly relations with the Chinese and tried to carry out negotiations with the Chinese representatives as to how best to bring about peace in Tibet and assuage the people's anxiety.

"While these negotiations were being carried out reinforcements arrived to strengthen the Chinese garrisons in Lhasa and Tibet.

"On the 17th of March two or three mortar shells were fired in the direction of the Norbulingka palace. Fortunately the shells fell in a nearby pond.

"After this the advisers became alive to the danger to the person of the Dalai Lama and in those difficult circumstances it become imperative for the Dalai Lama, the menbers of his family and his high officials to leave Lhasa. The Dalai Lama would like to state categorically that he left Lhasa and Tibet and came on to India of his own free will and not under duress.

"It was due to the loyalty and affectionate support of his people that the Dalai Lama was able to find his way through a route which is quite arduous.

"The route which the Dalai Lama took involved crossing the Kyi Chu and the Tsangpo (Brahmaputra) Rivers and making his way through the Lhoka area, Yarlung Valley, and Tsona Dzong before reaching the Indian frontier at Kanzey Mane, near to Chuthangmu.

"TWO EMISSARIES SENT

"On March 29, 1959, the Dalai Lama sent two emissaries to cross the Indo-Tibetan border, requesting the Government of India's permission to enter India and seek asylum there.

"The Dalai Lama is extremely grateful to the people and Government of India for their spontaneous and generous welcome as well as the asylum granted to him and his followers. India and Tibet have religious, cultural, and trade links over a thousand years and for Tibetans it has always been the land of enlightenment, having given birth to the Lord Buddha.

"The Dalai Lama is deeply touched by the kind greetings extended to him on his safe arrival in India by the Prime Minister, Mr. Jawaharlal Nehru, and his colleagues in the Government of India. The Dalai Lama has already sent a reply to this message of greetings.

"Ever since the Dalai Lama entered India at Kanzey Mane near Chuthangmu he has experienced in full measure the respect and hospitality extended to him by the people of the Kameng frontier division of the North East Frontier Agency, and the Dalai Lama would like to state how the Government of India's officers posted there had spared no effort in making his stay and journey through this extremely well-administered part of India as comfortable as possible.

"FUTURE TO BE WEIGHED

"The Dalai Lama will now be proceeding to Mussoorie, which he hopes to reach in the next few days. The Dalai Lama will give thought to his future plans and if necessary give expression to them as soon as he has had a chance to rest and reflect on recent events.

"His country and people have passed through an extremely difficult period and all that the Dalai Lama wishes to say at the moment is to express his sincere regret at the tragedy which has overtaken Tibet and to fervently hope that these troubles will be over soon without any more bloodshed.

"As Dalai Lama and spiritual head of all Buddhists in Tibet, his foremost concern is the well-being of his people and in insuring the perpetual flourishing of his sacred religion and the freedom of his country.

"While expressing once again thankfulness at his safe arrival in India, the Dalai Lama would like to take this opportunity to communicate to all his friends, well-wishers, and devotees in India and abroad his sincere gratitude for many messages of sympathies and concern with which they have flooded him."

POSITIVE STEPS IN FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD at this point an extremely able and provocative address delivered by the distinguished majority leader of the Senate [Mr. JOHNSON] before the Women's National Press Club banquet for the American Society of Newspaper Editors, at Washington, D.C., on April 16, 1959.

The address contains several important suggestions for improving our relations with nations abroad, in a positive and effective way. I am particularly interested in his proposals in regard to a university at Hawaii to serve as a link between Asia and the United States. I am hopeful that this address will receive the wide attention it deserves.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POSITIVE STEPS IN FOREIGN POLICY

(Address by Senate Democratic Leader LYNDON B. JOHNSON of Texas, before the Women's National Press Club banquet for the American Society of Newspaper Editors, Washington, D.C., April 16, 1959)

Madam Chairman, Mr. Ambassador, distinguished editors, ladies, and gentlemen, throughout our national experience, the month of April has been a month of history for Americans.

Our Congress met for the first time in April 180 years ago. General Washington was inaugurated as President in the same month.

Ninety-four years ago yesterday, Lincoln died here in Washington. And 14 years ago last Sunday, Franklin D. Roosevelt passed away at Warm Springs.

Our Civil War began in April 1861—and ended in April 1865. Fifty-two years later, in April of 1917, a man from the South, Woodrow Wilson, asked the United States to enter the war to make the world safe for democracy. And in April of 1945, men met at San Francisco to unite nations in the quest for world peace.

But of all our April anniversaries, the one which most directly affects our generation is the one which passes with the least notice. It comes next Wednesday when we enter the 13th year of the cold war.

It was on the 22d of April 1947, that the Senate approved legislation to implement the Truman doctrine. That was our official recognition of the situation into which Soviet communism had plunged the world.

My assignment tonight is to speak on positive aspects of foreign policy. I am joined in this assignment by a man who has made as many positive contributions to a stable and free world as any other—Ambassador Carlos Romulo.

STRONGHOLDS OF FREEDOM

The cold war has been on our part essentially a defensive struggle. We are attempting to hold fast the strongholds of freedom against the aggressions of communism. In that sense, our position at times has seemed negative.

But it is impossible to discuss positive aspects—or any other aspects—of foreign policy today except against the background of the cold war. It is the compelling fact of our day.

Although our position has been defensive, it has been imaginative and bold.

INITIATIVE AND FAITH

We have shown initiative—as in the Marshall plan, the Truman doctrine, point 4, and NATO. We have displayed courage—as in Iran, the Berlin airlift, Korea, and Lebanon. We have exhibited good faith—as in our dealings with nations we could have held as colonies.

But to a great extent, our policies have been motivated by sheer reaction to the probing thrusts of Soviet communism into the free world. And because of that motivation, we have tended to forget what should be the true moral basis of our policy.

There has been a tendency to say that we send food to India because we want to win that nation over to our side.

There has been a disposition to say that we send technicians to Southeast Asia because we want to halt the spread of communism.

IGNOBLE MOTIVES AND NOBLE DEEDS

There has been a readiness to exchange students with Europe because we wish to spread our ideas.

We have been ascribing ignoble motives to noble deeds. And in doing so, we have given the world the impression that we are bidding for friendship as traders bid for a sack of wheat.

Such an impression is an open invitation for those whose friendship we seek to shop around and see what the man on the other side of the street is willing to offer.

I think it is about time for us to change not our policy but our attitudes. I think it is about time for us to start proceeding on the assumption that we do things not because they are expedient but because they are right.

If we send food to India, we should do so because people are hungry and we have a surplus.

If we send technicians to Southeast Asia, we should do so because people need help and we have the necessary skills.

If we exchange students with Europe, we should do so because we wish to exchange knowledge.

A HANDSHAKE, NOT A TIP

The world wants America to reach out its hand for a handshake, not to leave a tip. That is the kind of America we must be.

It is fashionable, in discussing foreign policy, to call for bold, new ideas. Such ideas are always welcome—although we must never confuse mere novelty with real merit. But I suspect our problems will be solved eventually by the vigorous and imaginative application of policies we already have in force. Some of them date back for many years.

In another April, 69 years ago, there was formed in this hemisphere the International Union of American Republics. Our Secretary of State, addressing that convention, expressed our purposes this way:

"We believe that a spirit of justice, of common and equal interests between the American States, will leave no room for an artificial balance of power like unto that which has led to wars abroad and drenched Europe in blood."

This concept applies to our times and our challenges today.

JUSTICE AMONG NATIONS

We do not seek anything in this world other than justice among nations. We are not setting as our goal a precarious balance of power which will maintain not peace but a fearful and uneasy stalemate.

We must rest the alliance of free men on a common interest in mankind's well-being rather than on the common bond of fear.

Our country will soon enter important conferences which may settle the destiny of the world. We are entering those conferences, unfortunately, without the services of a great and dedicated American who has borne the foreign policy burden for many years.

It is conceivable that those conferences will settle many problems. It is to be hoped that they will relax some of the tensions which now threaten to blow the world apart.

But even if those conferences should settle all questions of armaments, past treaties and boundaries—and as reasonable men we know this is doubtful—we would still be faced by a Communist challenge vital to our survival.

THE TWOFOLD CHALLENGE

The challenge is twofold: the economic challenge of trade and the moral challenge of understanding the people of the earth who remain outside the struggle of East and West.

Khrushchev has boasted that the Soviet Union will destroy us in economic competition. Khrushchev is no idle braggart.

And the Soviets have been working for years among the uncommitted people of the earth. It would be foolish to pretend that their work has not been effective.

To meet the challenge of trade will not be easy. It will require first exploration of the thinking of our fellow free nations to determine what steps can be taken to bring about economic unity.

To meet the challenge of human understanding, however, will be far more difficult than meeting the challenge of trade. For too many years, we have neglected the simple things that would break down the barriers between ourselves and people who should be our friends.

LANGUAGE BARRIERS

For example, languages spoken by hundreds of millions of people all over the earth are hardly known in our land. The official languages of nations like the Union of South Africa, Korea, the Philippines, Pakistan and others are taught nowhere in the United States.

Our printing presses produce nothing that most of the world's population can read.

There are intellectual walls which must be broken down if we are to have mutual understanding. And there are ways of breaking down those walls.

Why don't we foster truly international centers of learning where the world's best and most mature minds can meet and exchange ideas?

We have the facilities; we have the scholars; we even have the sites.

We have recently taken an historic step in the development of our Nation. A group of mid-Pacific islands will soon share all the rights and responsibilities of the other 49 States in the Union.

The Hawaiian Islands lie astride the trade routes of the Pacific. Many of the people have close ties to the countries of the Far East. They enjoy the advantages of a university of stature and prestige.

AN INTERNATIONAL UNIVERSITY

Why do we not establish in Hawaii an international university as a meeting place for the intellectuals of the East and the West?

Why do we not seek to attract scholars and students alike from both the Orient and the Occident?

Hawaii could be the place at which professors from Harvard, Chicago, California, and all our great universities could meet with the learned men of Tokyo, Manila, Indonesia, Southeast Asia, India and Pakistan.

The great teachers of Asia could impart their learning to students from the West. And professors from the Western Hemisphere could lay before students of Asia the knowledge that has been gained in our part of the world.

In Hawaii, barriers of language would evaporate rapidly. People would gain new understanding and new respect for each other. And the intellectual association would benefit all mankind.

This is a concept which I have discussed many times with the distinguished and able Delegate from Hawaii, JOHN BURNS. It is a concept which we could put into actuality at a fraction of the cost of the weapons which we now ship to other nations of the world.

A PRACTICAL IDEA

That this is a practical idea has been demonstrated already by the University of Puerto Rico.

Under the American flag, and the wise leadership of Muñoz-Marín, the University of Puerto Rico has been building a bridge of understanding between us and the people of Latin America. A door to mutual understanding has been opened.

We have learned of the vital importance of the rich Spanish cultural heritage. And the Latin Americans have learned the truth about our hearts and our souls.

The University of Puerto Rico has been such a tremendous success that it has led the Senator from Montana, MIKE MANSFIELD, and the Senator from Florida, GEORGE SMATHERS, to propose a University of the Americas. And it is an idea which has great appeal.

Hawaii, a bright, new star in our flag, could also become a bridge spanning the Pacific.

We must not underestimate the importance of this bridge. The Communists long ago realized that the destiny of mankind could be settled in Asia. Leon Trotsky, the Bolshevik theoretician, said: "The road to Paris and London might lead through Kabul, Calcutta, and Bombay."

COMMUNIST CONQUEST

The Communists exiled and assassinated Leon Trotsky. But they did not exile this idea. And one of the greatest single blows that has ever been dealt against the free world was the Communist conquest of 650 million Chinese—who are gaining at the rate of 13 million people a year.

Compared to the people of Asia, our population is a drop in the bucket. There are 400 million Indians increasing at the rate of 7 million a year. Eighty million people inhabit the Indonesian chain. When these are added to the millions of Japan, Korea, southeast Asia and the Middle East, totaling 1,500 million, this means our 175 million is a very small minority in this world.

THE CHALLENGE BEFORE US

For the challenges before us, we need both new ideas and old boldness. But our future lies not in the multiplicity of ideas but in singleness of purpose.

That singleness of purpose must be dedication to the concept that this can be a better and freer world for all the nations.

That is not a goal which can be achieved in one night or by one idea or even by one policy. But it is a goal which is attainable if America assumes not just the political and military but the moral leadership which should be ours.

JOHN TATSEY ACQUIRES NATIONAL REPUTATION

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, on several occasions I have inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a series of news columns written by one of the most unique and clever journalists of our time. As many of my colleagues in the Senate will realize, I am referring to my close friend, John Tatsey, Blackfeet Indian Reservation policeman-columnist at Heart Butte, Mont.

John Tatsey writes with his own style and his columns are full of life and human interest. Recently John has received considerable acclaim and has built up a fan club in all corners of the Nation and it is composed of many notables.

Former President Harry S. Truman recently wrote me stating that Tatsey's articles "are some of the best I've ever read," comparing them to Mark Twain's announcement for President. Secretary of the Interior Fred Seaton is familiar with John Tatsey's work, and I know that Tatsey has many followers here on Capitol Hill. In addition, last week's issue of Time carries a story on Tatsey.

The April 12 issue of the Great Falls Tribune, Great Falls, Mont., carries an entertaining feature story on "Montana's Modern Day Will Rogers" by Bill James, which I know every CONGRESSIONAL RECORD reader will not want to miss.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have this article printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

I also ask unanimous consent to have printed at the conclusion of my remarks five of the latest news columns by John Tatsey which appeared in the Glacier Reporter.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Great Falls Tribune, Apr. 12, 1959]

BLACKFEET COLUMNIST ACQUIRING NATIONAL REPUTATION

(By Bill James)

HEART BUTTE.—John Tatsey, Blackfeet Indian Reservation policeman-columnist, has a way with words—the Tatsey way.

Tatsey handles words with as deft a Tatsey touch as he guides reservation friends into Browning or Heart Butte jails when they drink too liberally of the cup that cheers.

Although the 65-year-old Tatsey, whose Indian name is "Weasel Necklace," ignores commonly accepted rules of grammar, spelling and punctuation, his highly individual style of writing his "Heart Butte News" column has been receiving considerable national attention.

Senator MIKE MANSFIELD, a devoted Tatsey fan who describes the Indian columnist as "Montana's Modern Day Will Rogers," has enjoyed many a laugh when reading Tatsey's columns and has had several of them reprinted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Harry S. Truman, former President of the United States, is another Tatsey fan. The ex-President wrote to Senator MANSFIELD, saying Tatsey's articles "are some of the best I've ever seen."

"Have not seen anything I enjoyed more since I read Mark Twain's announcement for President," Truman added.

When Interior Secretary Fred Seaton met Tatsey at a Browning program, he joked that Tatsey received more space in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD than did the Secretary of State.

The current issue of Time Magazine carries a story about Tatsey. The Associated Press distributed a long feature story about Tatsey to newspapers in all parts of the Nation.

Tatsey, a good-natured man who looks younger than 65, writes his column for the Glacier Reporter but it is reprinted often in other publications. Mel Ruder, publisher-editor of the Hungry Horse News at Columbia Falls, frequently reprints Tatsey's column through a friendly agreement with the Glacier Reporter.

Dorothy Johnson, nationally known author who edits the "Montana Fourth Estate," publication of the Montana Press Association, is an ardent admirer of Tatsey and reprints choice gems of Tatsey humor. The Plentywood Herald reprints some Tatsey columns.

Other papers have asked Tatsey to write for them but he has declined to broaden his journalistic field.

"Lucky to write what I do now," he exclaims with a broad smile. His dark brown eyes reflect warmth and alertness as he casually runs a strong hand through his black hair, generously streaked with grey strands, and talks about letters and wires he has received about his writing.

"They come from all over—from Florida to California," he smiles. "Never answer. I don't know what would happen so to stay out of trouble I never write," he states.

Tatsey, a sturdy man who admits his 178 pounds is too heavy for his 5-foot 8-inch frame, admits that he writes more for the love of being a Heart Butte correspondent than for the money he receives for his newspaper stint.

Tatsey isn't sure how much money he gets from writing his weekly column.

"It's snoose money," he smiles. He has been chewing snuff since he was a boy. He doesn't pay too much attention to the money he gets from writing but points out he gets from $9 to $12 every few months from the Glacier Reporter and about $6 or $7 every few months from the Hungry Horse News.

Sometimes, he skips writing a column. During the hunting season, he takes hunting trips and occasionally guides a group of eastern friends on a trip so he is forced to forget his column for a while. When that happens, readers write and sometimes wire to find out what has happened.

Followers of Tatsey's columns are particularly fond of frequent items about activities of Stoles Head Carrier.

Some samples of his accounts of Stoles Head Carrier follow:

"Stoles Head Carrier went to Valier and got some guts or entrails and when he got home he had to cross a bridge, he slip and fell but still had guts."

"Stoles Head Carrier had a long rest and the first nice day he got George Running Wolf to take him to Valier to get repairs for his car and George had to leave him there because he could not load him in the car. So Stoles will be on the road soon."

"Tatsey was out hunting Monday morning where he saw something moving around so he waited till Joe Running Crane come up. By then we saw horses and we saw Stoles Head Carrier crawling around on hands and knees eating huckle berries. He did not see any game and come home just when the storm hit. Next day he went to town and was having a high old time from one bar to another."

"Stoles Head Carrier was around Conrad picking rock and someone started to bring him home and was lost in Valier and have not heard anything of him. Sure miss him at Heart Butte."

Tatsey says readers always ask what is wrong if he fails to mention Stoles Head Carrier in a column.

"When he behaves himself I got nothing on him," Tatsey explains.

Tatsey acknowledges he is fond of his friend, Head Carrier, a man of about 50 who weighs close to 300 pounds.

"Stoles has a good sense of humor and laughs about the things I write about him," Tatsey says. "It's true when I write about him so what can he do?" he asks seriously.

Tatsey says Stoles kids him too and that there is a give-and-take arrangement about kidding.

When Tatsey mentioned in his column Senator MANSFIELD had asked to meet him, Dorothy Johnson reprinted the column in "Montana Fourth Estate" with this note: "Some people would be knocked off their feet at being invited to meet a U.S. Senator at the Senator's specific request, but with Tatsey this incident has to take its turn after deer hunting, lost horses, potato picking, and tooth pulling."

Writing about his meeting with Senator MANSFIELD, Tatsey told about being called early to be in Browning, adding, "When Senator MANSFIELD came Mr. and Mrs. Tatsey had a picture taken with him. MIKE had his medicine pipe with him but did not offer Tatsey a peace smoke so Tatsey did not take him into the tribe or give him his Indian name but still we meet and made friends."

Tatsey said he has a high degree of respect for his friend, Senator MANSFIELD. In a recent column, Tatsey wrote:

"There was the Wolf Point Herald paper drifted in the Blackfeet Reservation and there were statements in it where the Sioux and Assiniboines are fighting over their tribal councilmen and some of our Democrats in the District of Columbia. We would not want to see our good friend, MIKE MANSFIELD, scalped. Better get a short haircut."

At times, Tatsey gives his Heart Butte readers a bit of advice like this: "There have been a tooth puller at Heart Butte the past week taking care of bad, bad teeth. Remember Heart Butte people there is some elk meat coming this winter and might be tough."

Tatsey keeps track of vital statistics in this manner:

"Mrs. Louise Old Rock has been buried at Heart Butte Cemetery. She passed away last Saturday morning at Blackfeet Hospital.

"Mrs. Lizzie Roundman passed away some time Saturday night and will be buried at Heart Butte. She leaves three sons and six daughters."

Social happenings receive this treatment:

"Mr. and Mrs. George Duck Head are visiting Mrs. Maggie Spotted Eagle for the weekend."

But items that stir the most comments are ones like these:

"A young man became a single guy last fall and last week he took a notion to use the old Indian custom of paying for a wife, he offered two cows but the mother said she would think it over.

"Vick Gregory the teacher left for Missoula Tuesday where he will get married and bring her back to Heart Butte.

"Two weeks ago four airmen came to Heart Butte for a stick game. They played couple of hours and when one got up he stopped, his outer overalls were around his ankles and he was hobbled with them. Good thing he had double pants on but he did not know what happened."

Tatsey doesn't hesitate to name names when he reports happenings at Heart Butte.

Writing about a Heart Butte man, he said the fellow visited a tavern for a few hours while his wife was waiting outside in the car. He said when the man came out "he had a young Browning girl and stopped at a corner and put his arms around her when his wife told him we are ready to go, he froze there for a minute."

Duties of a policeman are never far from Tatsey's mind. For instance, he mentioned in one column a Heart Butte man who "was picked up Sunday night back of George Whippert place where he was hung up by one leg on a barbed wire fence. More fences would help the police."

Tatsey's special brand of reservation humor is making his columns conversation pieces and collectors' items. For instance, he wrote about an elderly Indian who "was coming out of the tribal store with a bag of meat and bread when a young lady came and took the bag and told him that she would go home with him and cook and feed him. She walked so fast he could not keep up."

Or, his story about an Indian who was "a little intoxicated" last week. "He was all alone around the house. Tatsey was watching him with a field glass. Pretty soon he wheeled out a bicycle and put it on a little hill and got on and went down and took a spill. He left the bike there."

Then, Tatsey writes about a Heart Butte citizen who went out one morning with two buckets after water. "He never came back so one of his daughters went down to see what happened. The buckets were there but no father. He was already in Valier; he went after something stronger than white tail water."

Tatsey doesn't mind giving a friend a pat on the back. An example: "John Beaver from upper Big Badger had a party at Mike Swims Under place when the spud pickers came back. Mike played the fiddle and Beaver picked on the guitar so when you want a musician get Beaver."

Tatsey's career as a columnist began about 4 years ago when the publisher of the Glacier Reporter suggested that Tatsey was in an excellent position to write the Heart Butte column because he was one of the respected leaders and oldest residents in addition to being a policeman.

The policeman agreed to try writing. His columns became successful almost instantly in the Heart Butte area and with the 1,200 subscribers of the Glacier Reporter.

His position as a policeman has had a tendency to keep griping to a low murmur—and vigorous protests few and far between. The column added to his high standing in the community.

Naturally, there have been some complaints but Tatsey doesn't worry about them.

"I tell them what's what and that's all," he explains. "I tell them I write only what's true."

While a few complain about what he writes, the most complaints come from people who say they don't see their names in the paper often enough. Many friends volunteer choice bits of news about their neighbors and practically all of the Heart Butte area residents take pride in his writing. (Heart Butte was credited with a population of 100 in the 1950 census but Tatsey says there are about 250 to 300 families with a population of about 1,000 in the area.)

Milo K. Fields, publisher-editor of the Glacier Reporter, is proud of his star columnist and likes him personally.

"When I first came here 3 years ago after buying the paper, I was scared to death about his writing," Fields admits.

Fields pointed out that many Heart Butte people come to the Reporter's office every week to buy the paper so they can read Tatsey's column.

Explaining that he doesn't edit Tatsey's writing, except at rare times when the meaning isn't clear, Fields said "the secret of it is leaving it natural."

When readers appear at the Reporter office to complain about something Tatsey wrote, Fields refers them to Tatsey.

"Tatsey says they just don't defy his authority," the editor added.

Blackfeet tribal officials follow his column and get many laughs from it.

"I have always wondered how the world he gets away with all he does," one tribal council official laughed. "I wouldn't last overnight if I wrote that about them; I'd be scalped."

The official explained that Heart Butte is a closely knit community that would permit a respected oldtimer and leader like Tatsey to write lightly about it but would bitterly resent it if any outsider did the same.

Tatsey, born on his father's ranch near Heart Butte, says he is all Indian but that his father was a Canadian Blood Indian and his mother a Blackfeet.

He attended the Holy Family Mission School about 15 miles south of Browning.

"I got up to the seventh grade before I started to work for the Reclamation Service," he recalls. He helped put in irrigation ditches, driving mules pulling scrapers and other work around the irrigation project.

Tatsey has had a great deal of ranch experience. He and his son, Peter, are partners in a cattle ranch near Heart Butte. Tatsey has title to 320 acres of patent land and leases about 1,800 acres from individual landowners. His son leases land in addition to that his father has. The partners now have about 100 head of Hereford cattle and Peter also has about 200 sheep.

There are two Tatsey children living—Peter and a daughter, Mrs. Roy Doore of Browning. One son, Joseph, was killed in the South Pacific in 1943. An infantryman, Joseph was at Pearl Harbor when the Japanese opened the war.

Mrs. Tatsey, whose mother was a Sioux and her father Spanish-Mexican, wears the long braids of the older Indian women. An alert woman, Belle Tatsey is a warmhearted and genial lady with poise and an excellent sense of humor.

Tatsey, who is paid $300 each month for his policeman's duties, has been on the force steadily since 1950 but was a policeman off and on for a few years before 1950.

The Tatseys are popular in the Heart Butte area and frequently have visitors even before they are awake.

"They build a fire for us and put the coffee on," Mrs. Tatsey explains. "We always have someone visiting us," he adds proudly.

Friends of Tatsey say it is funny to see him bring a carload of friends from Heart Butte to Browning and then arrest them after they live it up too much in the bars.

Tatsey admits that looks funny but he points out there is a practical side involved. If he didn't give them rides, they would get to Browning another way, do as much drinking and then get in more serious trouble than they do when he books them at the jail for a short stay.

Mrs. Tatsey comments that it's real funny to hear a group of Indians sing when Tatsey takes them to Browning to stand trial.

"Some sing in English and some in Indian and then they argue which singing is best," she says. "I tell them just to be quiet when we are in town."

"Tatsey knows how to handle people," Fields says. "I have seen him take an Indian twice as big as he is and walk him down the sidewalk. And when John told the fellow to walk lively, the man would."

"Tatsey has guts," his friends proudly state. They tell about the time FBI agents and deputy sheriffs were keeping a wary watch on a house where they had cornered a man who had shot and killed another Indian. Tatsey drove up and walked calmly to the house, opened the door, and walked in. A few moments later, he appeared with the murderer, who, fortunately, had been asleep with three guns concealed in the bed.

A man who speaks on a higher plane than he writes, Tatsey reads magazines and the Great Falls newspapers. He likes to read the Official Detective magazine even though his granchildren say he should read the Bible more.

"Official Detective helps on my police work," Tatsey explains. "It gives me ideas on law enforcement."

Tatsey is deeply sympathetic about the plight of the Blackfeet. He thinks the thing needed most on the reservation is a housing program to furnish homes for young people.

"Too many are crowded into small homes," he says.

Then there is a desperate need for some industry on or near the reservation, he believes.

"There just aren't jobs for the people, and that is a hopeless condition for the young, especially, to be in," he contends. "The Federal Government don't help the Indians much," he said, referring to the money the Government spends on foreign aid.

Discussing the Government's resettlement program for Indians, Tatsey points out it isn't too good for the Blackfeet.

"The Indians don't stay resettled, because they are not used to cities and long for the country," he says. "The resettlement program works better with mixed bloods than with fullboods," he adds.

Tatsey would like to see a small sawmill started on the reservation so the men could saw timber to build the homes that are needed so badly.

The average Indian on the reservation doesn't think much about the danger of an atomic or hydrogen war, Tatsey said, explaining, "They don't read too much and they think about today, not about a war ahead. I tell them they should read to find out more but they don't do it."

The affable Tatsey smiles and said, "Oh, yes," when asked if he enjoyed writing—which he does by pen on any kind of paper available since he does not type. Saying it takes him about half an hour to write a column, Tatsey doesn't know whether he would like to be a full-time writer.

"Well, when I run out of a job, I might," he said.

He likes Senator MANSFIELD'S description of him as "Montana's modern day Will Rogers."

"I read about that Rogers fellow in Grit magazine and think he was pretty good. I'd like to team up with that man if he was alive," the Heart Butte sage remarked.

The little story about our Governor having some difficulty over his future mansion: The Blackfeet have a little hard time with funds to get by through the last quarter of the winter, but whenever they make up their minds they will try something to fill their promise. They would sure want to give a new tepee. If they cannot buy the goods, there are enough elk hides to make his office and living quarters fair, Governor, anyhow.

There was some disturbance around Mr. Bobick home at the square. One evening someone was making a lot of noise outside so he grabbed his shotgun and hollered out the window get the h___ away, but found out it was Mrs. Bob Englement playing with her little girl on a snowbank.

Stoles has been in Browning since the per capita payment and has changed quarters. He was seen sleeping in the Yegan lobby where he is not crowded by prisoners.

Joe Running Crane went after water the other morning. When he dip the bucket he slipped and fell in and cut his forehead on the ice. Came in the house, his wife bandaged his head then he went out and started his car and went and stuck his fingers near the fanbelt and nearly cut two fingers off. He will know better next time.

This is all true happenings only with a little joke to finish off with. Be good sports be with you next week.

Stoles has been going to town but awful careful what he does.

The Heart Butte Trapper has returned to Heart Butte and has started his traplines; first night two beaver.

Peter H. Tatsey went to Fisher Flats and bought some alfalfa hay for lambing use; and also the cattle are calving; has new calves, lost one.

HEART BUTTE NEWS

(By John Tatsey)

Easter Sunday was a big day at Heart Butte. People came from different parts for church.

Albert Spearson the carpenter on old folks home has finished several homes so far and Earl Olinger had the contract of remodeling the jail and is now ready to accommodate the boys.

Tatsey the police was in Browning when the $25 payment was made. It sure was a mob. There was a young lady who was pushed around and when she finally got in she did not have any shoes and another girl got in but her coat got caught in the door. She just walked out of it and got her $25.

Stoles Head Carrier came to town day before the payment and spent his time at J. H. Walters' place 'till after the payment was over so he did not get in on the other guys treat.

The roads department have started working on the Old Agency-Heart Butte road so it won't be so rough.

The sheepman Larson of Big Badger sheared his sheep last week. Lucky the weather is good.

The piece in the Tribune last week when there was an item on John Tatsey and who ever wrote it did a good job with one or two errors but it still made John feel like somebody. Thanks.

HEART BUTTE NEWS

(By John Tatsey)

Sam New Breast and John Tatsey were sent to Missoula last Friday where they attended the meetings of other tribes. Meetings were interesting of different speeches made.

Tatsey was welcomed by the University staff, and Tatsey felt that he knew these people a long time. Meet a lot of friends through the items which he writes from Heart Butte. There were a few from other reservations who came. James Sweeney and wife were from Wolf Point and Henry Archdale and Leslie Four Star from Frazer. There were more Flat Heads dressed Indian costumes and danced different ceremonial dances.

New Breast and Tatsey returned home Sunday night. They enjoyed a fine trip. There was a barbeque elk so that sure hit the spot on the part of the Indians. Real good meal.

Heart Butte people got bad when the police was gone Saturday and Sunday but nothing hurt.

Mr. and Mrs. G. G. Kipp of Old Agency drove to Missoula and returned Sunday.

Mr. and Mrs. James H. Walters motored to Hot Springs where Jim bathed on Sunday afternoon and got home OK.

These are some happenings that came out from Browning last week. There is a little change in the give-me-a-dime business. They kiss you for a dime although these are men that are doing the kissing.

There was a man on the street last week. He got angry at a turtle and chased it across the street but could not catch up to it.

Stole Head Carrier went hunting last Saturday and came out with some elk. Wonder how he got it. Stoles has been wearing a red sweater with three white stripes. One for being a good talker, one for being a good border at Good Talker, and one for being a good border at James Walters. The third will have to ask where.

Sam New Breast went to Helena Wednesday for a church gathering.

Sam Spotted Eagle and family are motoring to Helena to be there Thursday for the church convention.

There has been a lot of talking and taking of pictures of your Heart Butte reporter so there should be some understanding. There were pictures in the Tribune which every one wanted in the Sunday paper just to see and read what Tatsey looked like and what he had to say in the Tribune.

Joe Running Crane said someone was riding around Four Horn Lake and saw some trout swimming along the edge of the lake when the lead fish came out of the water and asked this rider if Joe Day Rider and Dan Boss Ribs were still living.

JOHN TATSEY, INDIAN REPORTER

The national publicity our Heart Butte reporter, John Tatsey, has been getting lately is enough to make any newspaper man or writer jealous. Few, if any, journalists have several times been given three or four pages in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, space in Time magazine, and four pictorial pages in a magazine section of a large daily, not to mention many writeups in any number of weekly papers that reprint his column.

Usually such publicity is given only to those persons of prominent or outstanding character, or those who are noted for their exceptional accomplishments. So, why not John Tatsey? John is a man of outstanding character, rare ability, and probably the best known weekly columnist in these United States.

Tatsey ponders somewhat bewilderedly over all of this publicity, which has not changed his good-humored style of writing in the least, and only comments, "Don't the rest of the people know that the Indians read and write now days?"

"I write because I like it," John continues, "and I tell the truth about what I know. Indians are naturally happy people and they like to kid each other. I do a little kidding by writing about my friends, all in fun, and nobody gets hurt."

Tatsey's main philosophy is a good joke, written or spoken. "If I can make someone else smile or laugh, I figure it helps everyone," he comments. "If a fellow gets drunk or gets arrested, it's his own fault and he should expect to be kidded about it."

John has many ways of expressing his humor, sometimes in form of a warning. For instance, when he has to escort one of his problem friends to Jimmy Walters' boardinghouse (tribal jail) he often laughingly tells them he is taking them to the best first-class hotel in town, but they must keep the room clean because they may be back there the next night.

Jimmy's hotel is one of John's main subjects of pen. "And why not?" John emphasizes. "Jimmy has more customers every night than all the rest of the hotels put together. He runs a good boardinghouse and the customers can always find some of their friends there to visit with. It's the only place in the world like it. Everything is strictly personal, even the service. You do everything personally."

"You know, it's too bad they can't print 'smoke signals,' I could really tell them some hot news," John laughs.

That is John Tatsey, and that is the way he writes. He calls his shots, names the ball. And who can argue against the truth?

A PROGRAM FOR THE NATIONAL FORESTS

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, recently I suggested to the Senate a program for the national forests sent to the Congress by the Secretary of Agriculture be referred to both the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. In some quarters this report is being heralded as a great achievement on the part of Secretary Benson. It is a great achievement but I am inclined to think that the Secretary knows that the course for him to follow has been well charted for him. He did not need to "break new ground," as Gifford Pinchot said in describing his efforts to create and develop our national forests system.

Secretary Benson has received numerous urgings from the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY] and many other Senators to present this long-range program. In 1956, the senior Senator from Montana requested that this program be developed. He reiterated his request again in June of 1958 with a special committee print on "Full Development of Our Public Resources." Again in July of last year under the leadership of the senior Senator from Montana, the Montana delegation had the Forest Service regional office in Missoula prepare a special study on the full development of Montana's forest resources. That report was published as a Senate document in January of this year. I ask unanimous consent that at this point in my remarks an editorial from the Great Falls Tribune, entitled "A Program for Vast Growth of Forest Products Industry," be printed in the RECORD.

In his customary quiet manner, the senior Senator from Montana has provided not only leadership but catalytic action which has propelled Secretary Benson to bring forth this long overdue but well-conceived program for our national forests. Because these forests are so important to our Nation and so vital to the development of the West, it is my hope that the Congress will give full and careful consideration to his recommendations. For my own part, I intend to be guided by Secretary Benson's own words, which I quote:

> Legislative authorities for the recommended program are generally adequate * * * appropriation requests to implement the program will be submitted to the Congress in future years in connection with budget presentations after due consideration of the overall physical needs and resources of the Federal Government.

It is my view that we cannot delay putting this program into effect and that it should receive careful consideration by the Appropriations Committee, with the thought in mind that selected programs which are inadequately financed under this year's budget be given reasonable increases.

It is my hope that the Senate Interior and Insular Affairs Committee will proceed as it has in the past in its efforts to seek improvements of all the programs on the national forests created from the public domain. It is also my hope that the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry will give consideration to the problems of the eastern forests other than those created from the public domain. Between the efforts of these two great committees, the Congress should be able to arrive at a determination of the steps which are needed for full water, forest, range, recreation and mineral development of our national forests.

As a westerner, I am keenly aware of the role the national forests are going to play in our future development. The senior Senator from Montana has long supplied leadership in securing recognition of this role. I congratulate him on his achievements, past and prospective.

I ask unanimous consent that there may be included in the RECORD as a part of my remarks an editorial from the Great Falls, Mont., Tribune of February 5, 1959.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A PROGRAM FOR VAST GROWTH OF FOREST PRODUCTS INDUSTRY

There perhaps is no field of potential development in Montana that offers more favorable possibilities for profitable expansion than that based on our forest resources. That situation gives prime importance to a long-time program sponsored by Montana's congressional delegation to open the way for a statewide growth in this category.

Productive possibilities were inventoried last summer by Regional Forester Charles L. Tebbe and are set forth in a 40-page report under the title: "Full Use and Development, Timber Resources of Montana."

Sparked by favorable markets, modern processing methods and new timber uses, Montana's forests are already a highly important factor in our expanding economy. According to the Forest Service survey, they are providing some 8,000 full-time jobs, representing $40 million in annual payroll, in primary production of timber products. That includes the processing necessary to convert the timber into products for the wholesale market, such as dry-surfaced lumber and dimension, pulpwood or pulp, power poles, posts and Christmas trees. Another 1,600 full-time jobs—some $8 million a year in wages—are derived from additional processing of wood in Montana. That is exclusive of about 1,100 Federal, State and private foresters and their employees who are paid nearly $7 million a year.

But, according to the study, these same forests could provide for triple the number of full-time jobs, and triple the present payroll in primary production. Secondary expansion could boost the total annual payroll to more than a quarter of a billion dollars.

The main initial requirement for starting this expansion snowball is construction of adequate roads to open these forest resources to use.

Montanans in Congress and others from States of extensive forest acreage are properly pressing for a speed-up in the program for constructing such roads.

This program would pay big dividends. It would not denude the forests because the Forest Service is charged with the responsibility of seeing that it is carried forward on a sustained growth basis.

DEVELOPMENT OF FORT CLATSOP NATIONAL MEMORIAL IN OREGON

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, a most comprehensive and thorough report on the progress of development of the Fort Clatsop National Memorial was given to the 12th annual Pacific Northwest History Conference in Portland, Oreg., by Dr. John Hussey, historian of the National Park Service in the Pacific seaboard area.

Dr. Hussey's information is most encouraging to those of us who successfully sponsored the Fort Clatsop legislation in the 85th Congress. Fort Clatsop is located near Astoria, Oreg.

I ask unanimous consent that an article from the Oregonian of April 13, 1959, entitled "Fort Clatsop Monument Project Faces Two-Year Land Acquisition Period," be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I want to add my own thought that I have been very favorably impressed with the businesslike approach of Dr. Hussey and other officials of the National Park Service to this great historic commemoration connected with the immortal expedition of Meriwether Lewis and William Clark.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FORT CLATSOP MONUMENT PROJECT FACES 2-YEAR LAND ACQUISITION PERIOD

(By John Bailey)

Completion of Fort Clatsop at Astoria as a national historical monument will come within 2 years after necessary land is acquired, a representative of the National Park Service told the 12th annual Pacific Northwest History Conference in Portland Saturday.

Final day of the conference's session brought talks by prominent Northwest historians and was highlighted Saturday night by a fashion show of authentic Indian costumes and authentic Indian dances.

In a business session, Sigfried Rolland, professor of history at the University of Idaho, was retained as chairman of the conference; Thomas Vaughan, director of the Oregon Historical Society, was reelected to the executive committee, and Bruce LeRoy, director of the Washington State Historical Society, was named secretary-treasurer.

Outlining future plans of the National Park Service in the Northwest, Dr. John Hussey of San Francisco stressed proposed improvement of the Fort Clatsop monument. Members of the Oregon Historical Society sponsored the historical conference's fifth annual spring history forum here Thursday, Friday, and Saturday in the Multnomah Hotel.

LAND NEEDED

Dr. Hussey said acquisition of land is all that stands in the way of completing the monument, and he said it will be finished within 2 years after the land is obtained.

The speaker said the Park Service found that residential building was encroaching on the area needed for the monument and the agency recommended its area be increased to 125 acres.

Designated boundaries of the monument approved March 27 by the Secretary of the Interior included that acreage, and Clatsop County officials have agreed to relocate a county road which presently interferes with development plans, he said.

Plans call for re-creating the historic scene which served as the winter camp of Lewis and Clark in the winter of 1805 and 1806, and construction of a visitors' center and parking lot. With completion of the project, visitors will be able to walk the same trail to the river which was used by Lewis and Clark more than 150 years ago, he said.

He urged history teachers to make use of the monument as an aid in teaching by making field trips to the site with students.

EXPLANATION FURNISHED

Dr. Hussey said the National Park Service is obligated not only to preserve and re-create the past but to explain events which took place there.

"It is a source of history without which we can't write about history and can't understand it," he said. "It has the power to make the past come alive."

Also on National Park Service drawing boards for further development are the Sitka National Monument in Alaska, the Whitman Monument near Walla Walla, Wash., Fort Vancouver, and lava beds near Klamath Falls.

Dr. Hussey explained that appropriations for monument development formerly were on the hit-or-miss basis which did not always provide sufficient funds for proposed projects. Present proposals will be made possible through Mission 66, which provides for preparation of areas under national park supervision for some 80 million visitors by 1966.

Supplementing Dr. Hussey's remarks was William Everhart, also of San Francisco, who explained that the Park Service is conducting an extensive study for possible historical monuments and recently has completed a report on the route of the Lewis and Clark expedition to Fort Clatsop.

Other speakers during the conference's afternoon session were Dr. Erna Gunther, of the Washington State Museum in Seattle, who discussed "Captain George Vancouver in the Washington Country," and Mrs. Hazel Mills, Oregon State Library, who gave a biography of Frances Fuller Victor, Oregon historian.

Don Willner, Portland attorney who served as chairman of a legislative interim committee on migratory labor in Oregon, compared the migrants of today to those 100 years ago when pioneers moved into the Oregon country.

He said pioneers faced unlimited opportunities in a land of plenty while the migrants of today face a lifetime of want. Willner said the committee found that average wage of the migrant laborers is $32 a week for head of the family or $80 for the entire family, a total of about $1,000 a year.

Climaxing the 3-day forum was presentation of native Indian costumes of Pacific Northwest tribes by Dr. Gunther held in conjunction with authentic dances of the Kwakuitl culture presented by the Holm Dancers of Seattle.

RESIGNATION OF SECRETARY OF STATE JOHN FOSTER DULLES

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, the resignation of Secretary of State Dulles is now official.

Last year I wrote a guest column for the late Tom Stokes. I used it to express my respect and admiration for the manner in which Mr. Dulles conducted his office. During the past year his record is one of even greater achievement. My sentiments for that work only emphasize what I said a year ago. For this reason I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD as a part of these remarks so much of the article referred to as applies to Mr. Dulles and his work.

We can be truly thankful that we have had in the office of Secretary of State a man so dedicated and so able as John Foster Dulles. His resignation is a loss to every American and, in fact, to the entire free world. Though he will be sorely missed, he is being succeeded by a man whom I know to be able, well-informed and patriotic, the Honorable Christian A. Herter.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DULLES' DEDICATION TO NATION: SECRETARY'S STEADFASTNESS IS CALLED BENEFIT TO UNITED STATES AND OBSTACLE TO FOE

(EDITOR'S NOTE.—This is another in the Statesmen's Series of columns being written by distinguished personages in the Government, national affairs, business, and the military for Thomas L. Stokes, who is seriously ill.)

(By Hon. LEVERETT SALTONSTALL, U.S. Senator from Massachusetts)

Since the beginning of our Nation, courage and fortitude have been hallmarks of America and the American way of life. Our cities, towns and farms were carved out of a wilderness; our Government was created out of a fight for freedom.

We have had to have strong leaders to guide us during the growth of our Nation. Courage and determination are, therefore, among the most priceless qualities of our heritage and of those who serve our country. These qualities have very much distinguished our present Secretary of State.

The primary duty of a Secretary of State is to advance the interests of our country around the world, protect American citizens and their interests in other countries and to do his utmost to keep peace. Secretary John Foster Dulles has done just that.

He has always worked primarily to promote the security of the United States and the cause of peace. He has indeed devoted his entire life to advancing the interests of our Nation in international affairs. Without his guidance of these tremendous international problems, we might well have suffered many more setbacks and achieved much less in our cold war struggles.

President Eisenhower's policies with Mr. Dulles' advice and guidance have kept us out of war without sacrificing our principles and without compromising the objectives which we seek. Although from day to day we cannot be sure that we are free from the threat of aggression, we have maintained under this leadership peace without compromise.

But whether we agree with Mr. Dulles' policies or not, I think all of us must agree on one thing—he has been determined in his beliefs, steadfast in his devotion to America's peaceful objectives. He has stood firm for the principles he knows to be in the best interests of the United States.

He has been bitterly attacked here at home by those who disagree with his handling of our international problems. At one time he was sharply criticized for his statement that our Nation was on the brink of war; yet at the same time he is criticized for giving way in the face of the Communist aggression.

He is attacked for failing to inject any daring new ideas into our foreign policy, yet he is criticized for his personal visits with heads of state all over the world—a Dulles innovation. He is attacked for refusing to accede to the futile gestures offered by the Russians with respect to a summit conference; he is criticized for not being more vigorous in demanding the return of American citizens held by the Communists and in the same breath he has been criticized for not permitting Americans to travel in those areas where the Communists have been known to seize visitors from the Western World.

His steadfastness in the face of bitter attacks has repeatedly paid off in advancing U.S. interests throughout the world. He stood fast when the last stronghold of Nationalist China stood in the shadow of the Communist tyrant—Formosa was saved. His firmness in the face of the crises in Vietnam and the Middle East has proved to be insurmountable to the Communists.

The recent SEATO meetings in Manila have indicated an unusual singleness of purpose among its member nations. After the first day of meetings, when all of the speakers joined to voice a common anti-Communist purpose, the Soviets renewed their propaganda barrage against Mr. Dulles.

These characteristics of Mr. Dulles have been particularly manifest in his stand on the Russian urgings for a summit meeting. He has been firm in his insistence that all preparatory steps must be concluded before any such conference is held.

He and the President want to insure that a summit conference has a chance for real progress toward the achievement of world peace and that it is not merely a spectacular vehicle for Communist propaganda. At the same time we certainly will not close any avenue, no matter how difficult the task may be, to achieve world peace. But we must not be deluded into a summit conference which because of lack of adequate preparation can only result in an opportunity for increased Russian propaganda.

Mr. Dulles has negotiated more with the Russians than has any other living American. Thus his judgment as to the conditions under which negotiations will best serve the interests of the free world is of utmost importance, not alone to us but also to our allies.

Since the retirement of Winston Churchill, Mr. Dulles has become the No. 1 target of Communist attacks. More propaganda has been directed against him by the Soviets than against any other living person.

This is a tribute to his courage and to his effectiveness as a negotiator with the Russians during the past decade; his only sin is his dedication to America and the principles we stand for. For this I commend him; he deserves the support of all Americans.

A REPORT BY HON. AVERELL HARRIMAN FROM INDIA AND PAKISTAN

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, following the elections in New York last fall, Gov. Averell Harriman, who has devoted many full and useful years in the service of our country, did not choose a life of easy retirement. In a move which typifies his great energy and his devotion to his country, Governor Harriman went to India and Pakistan for first-hand observations of developments in one of the troubled areas of the world.

Governor Harriman reported his visit to the American people through a series of articles written for the North American Newspaper Alliance and published throughout this country and in many foreign newspapers.

Governor Harriman's articles are so informative that I believe most Senators will wish to read them. I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the body of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A REPORT FROM INDIA AND PAKISTAN

(By Averell Harriman)

ARTICLE I. HARRIMAN, ON TOUR, FINDS INDIA AWARE OF RED CHINA'S MENACE

NEW DELHI, INDIA.—The best news out of India today is that her leaders are finally aware of the menace of Communist China.

Impressed by communism's achievements but repelled by its methods, they are now facing up to the fact that the world's most populous democracy is in crucial competition with the world's most populous dictatorship. Either they or the Chinese will become the model for Asia's awakening peoples.

This has been the underlying theme in all the talks I have had this past week with India's top leaders, including Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru, as well as local officials. The Chinese, once hailed as partners in Asia's struggle against colonialism, are now beginning to be regarded with apprehension as rivals in a race to improve the living standards of half the people of earth. As director of India's Institute of Population Studies wrote last month, "Before we realize what is happening, Red China may be breathing down our neck."

Concern about China is not often expressed publicly—although Mr. Nehru did refer to it in November as an army camp—but this is because India's official policy, though dedicated to democracy, is one of nonalinement in the cold war. Privately, government officials at many echelons cite China and its commune system as a reason for spurring the realization of their second 5-year plan as well as carefully preparing for the third 5-year plan starting in 1961.

"We have awakened our people's expectations," I was told by a young man in charge of a community development project. "They are becoming impatient. And if we do not satisfy their expectations, they will be attracted by the achievements of our neighbor to the north."

He did not need to add that if India's 400 million people ever followed China's Communist example, the rest of Asia would soon follow suit.

New sense of urgency

This sense of urgency in the competition is not only something new in India (it was not so long ago that Mr. Nehru expressed fraternal praise of Communist China), but it is one of several factors that have gradually mellowed Indian attitudes toward the United States. After a week in the country, I fully agree with India's Ambassador to Washington, who recently said that "our relations have never been better." The expressions of friendliness toward the United States that I have heard everywhere are a welcome contrast to the criticism and even suspicion that an American could expect to encounter a few years ago.

What has happened is that India's leaders, increasingly aware of their identity with the democratic world, are today less inclined to find fault with every aspect of our sometimes misguided foreign policy.

Four factors for change

I think there are at least four factors—apart from the concern over China—that have softened Indian feelings about the United States in the last 2 or 3 years:

First, we have been fortunate in that our two Ambassadors during this period—JOHN SHERMAN COOPER and Ellsworth Bunker—are the kind of men Indians like and respect.

Second, there have been fewer careless statements out of Washington—such as Secretary of State Dulles' ill-considered remark about Goa. [In December 1955, Secretary Dulles and the Portuguese Foreign Minister issued a statement referring to "Portugal's provinces in the Far East." The Indian Government interpreted this as meaning the United States supported Portugal's claim that Goa, a settlement on the West Coast of the Indian subcontinent, is a province of Portugal. The Indian position is that Goa is a colony held by force. Officially, the United States position on Goa has always been neutral.]

And there is a more understanding attitude by our press of India's problems and sensitivities. At the same time, first hand reports by Indian visitors to the United States have helped dispel some of the myths about United States materialism.

Third, the Soviet Union's brutal intervention in Hungary—and the murder of Imre Nagy—shocked many Indians into realizing what Soviet colonialism means.

Fourth, our relatively modest but timely economic aid—mostly loans with no strings attached—has favorably impressed Indian leaders who were formerly suspicious of our motives.

Perhaps I should also mention that after 12 years of independence, India's leaders are more sure of themselves (and therefore less sensitive to criticism) and better able to appreciate their friends in the West now that time has cooled the left-over passions of colonial days.

Problems India faces

With this new political maturity has come the realization that Americans, more than most people, are in a position to understand what Nehru this month called the "tremendous adventure" of building up a new nation by democratic means.

But these first, encouraging impressions of a country I had not seen since 1946—the year before independence—should not obscure the fact that India is beset by social, economic and political problems that fairly stagger the imagination. This is a nation where four out of five people can still not read or write.

It is a country short of technicians, short of capital, short of nearly everything except people. And people are increasing about half as fast again as food production; despite Government-backed program of birth control, there are 6 million more Indians to be fed, housed, clothed, and employed every year.

That is why India is a nation desperately in need of assistance if her tremendous adventure is not to end in tremendous tragedy. In her race with Communist China, which has received massive Soviet aid topped by a 5-billion-ruble loan this month, India has certain advantages—vigorous and determined leadership, a well-trained civil service, world-renowned scientists, a good railroad system, and a fledgling industrial base, undamaged by war, on which to build.

Her big disadvantage is that the democratic methods of education and persuasion are not as quick as those of a ruthless dictatorship in achieving the spectacular production increases that Asians are being told to expect.

India's progress is steady and impressive. Thanks to the community development program, life in one-half of the nation's 500,000 villages is brighter after many years of darkness. But the ambitious goals of the second 5-year plan are not being met, and the third will flounder without substantial injections of foreign capital.

As Vice President Sarvepalli Radhakrishan told me, "We are moving in the right direction, but our pace is far too slow."

In the coming weeks, I intend to study India's manifold problems at close range on a tour that will take me from the high Himalayas down to the southern state of Kerala, where the Communists have come to power by exploiting the discontent of a suddenly impatient people.

ARTICLE II. SOVIET SUCCESSES IN INDIA STRESSED DESCRIBING BIG CONSTRUCTION EFFORT, HARRIMAN SAYS RUSSIANS GET HEADLINES

BHILAI, INDIA.—In less than 2 years, a task force of Russian engineers in pith helmets and khaki workclothes has helped transform this dot on the map of central India from a drowsy cluster of huts to a booming industrial community of 65,000 steel and construction workers.

They are assisting in the construction of a steel mill that is already producing pig iron and that by 1961 will have a capacity of a million tons of steel, or one-sixth of the nation's planned output.

To make this project possible, the Soviet Government loaned India about half the total cost—$140 million (at 2½ percent interest)—for the purchase of Russian equipment, and sent in 800 engineers and technicians who knew from experience at home or in China how to put up a modern steel plant from scratch.

As in China, these Russians have not tried to run the show; instead, they act as advisers and instructors to the Indian staff officially in charge. The result has been a smooth-working partnership based on mutual respect.

I talked at length with both Indians and Russians. The latter, with their wives and children, now number some 1,500. Relations seemed cordial but not intimate. (There is not much socializing.) These conscientious Russians were frankly homesick—they don't care for the hot climate—and eager to get on with the job. But they and the Indians shared a mutual enthusiasm for "our steel mill" that transcended differences in political ideology.

Soviet aid is conspicuous

Bhilai is a vivid symbol of India's determination to industrialize as rapidly as possible. It is also a symbol of Russia's decision to participate in India's development in a spectacular way. Although Soviet aid to India so far amounts to less than one-fifth of America's $1,600 million worth of grants and credits, they are selecting projects, like Bhilai, that make headlines.

For example, the quiet and continuing efforts of U.S. agricultural experts to increase food production never receive the kind of publicity that the Russians get each time an Indian official cuts a ribbon to dedicate one of their new blast furnaces.

American aid is certainly appreciated by India's top leaders—who know how our shipments of food grains averted hunger and a serious inflation last year—but its impact on the people can be judged by recent public opinion polls that show a considerable number of Indians now think their biggest benefactor is the Soviet Union.

It can be argued that India is trying to do too much too soon, and that the emphasis right now should be less on building steel mills that employ relatively few people and more on increasing food production. The per capita daily calorie intake is only about 1,800. This is far too little, particularly in a nation where machines have not yet replaced muscles. And the population is growing at the rate of 6 million a year.

Steel is a symbol

But the argument is academic. The decision has been taken by India's planners to develop heavy industry. Two good crops a few years ago may have led them to understand the food problem, but in any case it would have been hard to resist the glamour of steel—which has become a symbol of economic independence in underdeveloped countries.

Thus, thanks to the Bhilai project, to two other government plants going up with British and German help and to the expansion of the great Tata works and other privately owned mills, India will soon be able to boast of a 6 million-ton-a-year steel industry, evenly divided between the private and public sectors.

For those who deduce from official statements that India is heading toward full nationalization, I might add that 90 percent of the industrial output outside of public utilities is still in private hands.

The men in charge of planning India's economic future told me that home-produced steel was essential for general industrial development and much-needed jobs for the millions of chronically unemployed. For instance, steel produced at Bhilai will be cheaper than imported steel and will save India $150 a ton in scarce foreign exchange.

As for food production, they point out that, with steel and heavy industry, India can build more fertilizer plants like the one I saw at Sindri, which already furnishes one-third of the Nation's present minimum needs.

Nineteen sixty breakthrough

India now requires a million additional tons of food grains each year—or $100 million worth of imports—just to take care of her population increase. They estimate that these requirements can be more than met by building a $44 million fertilizer plant each year for the next 5 years.

The goal of the planners is to achieve a breakthrough by the end of the third 5-year plan in 1966 that will not only double India's average per capita annual income of $56, but transform India, in Nehru's phrase, "from an underdeveloped to a self-supporting nation"—that is, a prospering nation capable of obtaining its foreign exchange through trade and normal channels of credit and investment.

The 5-year plans may be overambitious; the second one is already running about 15 percent behind schedule. But you cannot blame those responsible for India's future for setting their sights high, and keeping them high. The plans not only spell out the kind of progress India's people are demanding from their government, but also give them something to look forward to.

Already, after only 12 years of independence, you can see everywhere that India's 400 million people are astir. In the villages, the dedication of the young community development officials is inspiring; and the new brick construction rising among the mud huts is a sign that farmers, no longer under the landlord's yoke, are developing a feeling of ownership and self-reliance.

Touring the Damodar Valley in eastern India, the source of 90 percent of the nation's coking coal, I was much impressed by the new dams and factories that are creating power, jobs, flood control and tillable land affecting millions of people. (Also impressive are the modern housing projects being erected by both private and public enterprises.) This Indian version of our TVA is costing $250 million, but like its American model it will prove to be a priceless investment.

Meanwhile, it is no secret that India is desperately short of foreign exchange to tide her over the critical few years until the breakthrough.

Capital is hard to raise in a country where fewer than 500,000 families have taxable incomes above $600 a year, and where 200 million live on no more than 10 cents a day. Capital has little chance to accumulate. In spite of that, most of the cost of the new development comes from Indian resources.

I asked India's top economic experts what they would need in loans from all countries to fulfill their plans. Estimates varied from $2 billion to $4 billion, spread over the third 5-year plan—preferably in long-term credits to make possible the import of required capital goods. (I am inclined to believe the higher figure is closer to the need, if only because pride and enthusiasm tend to make the experts underestimate their nation's problems.)

This is a lot of money. But it is still only 10 to 20 percent of the plan's projected costs. And with neighboring—and competitive—Red China, making its "great leap forward" through regimentation and the help of Soviet loans, India cannot afford to be leisurely about the future.

How far is the Soviet Union prepared to underwrite India's development as well? I hear it is negotiating to build plants to make heavy machinery, optical glass, and pharmaceuticals in different parts of India, just as it is now building Bhilai, and it expects to reap dividends of good will for itself and prestige for the Indian Communist Party.

This is the sort of competition the West is up against in India. Our disadvantage is the same as India's disadvantage vis-a-vis China: Democracies cannot move as swiftly (or as ruthlessly) as dictatorships.

When the Kremlin leaders were told by the Indian Ambassador that India had to have wheat to avert a famine in 1951, they were loading grain ships within 48 hours; our Government had been "studying" the question for months.

The fact that we later sent India 20 times as much wheat as did the Russians is not generally understood; they got the headlines.

India is a nation on the march. No visitor can fail to be impressed by the zeal with which her leaders are trying to overcome staggering economic and social problems. But zeal alone is not enough, for India's economy is like a plane taking off from a newly built runway—it can't afford to lose momentum or altitude.

ARTICLE III. HARRIMAN WARNS ON REDS IN INDIA, BUT SAYS REGIME IN KERALA MAY YET PROVE SPUR TO CAUSE OF DEMOCRACY

TRIVANDRUM, INDIA.—You don't have to be here long to find out that tropical little Kerala is in many ways unique among India's 14 states. It is first in population density (more than 1,000 people per square mile); first in literacy (more than 50 percent); first in the proportion of Christians (one-third since St. Thomas came here to spread the gospel in A.D. 52), and first in unemployment (1,600,000 out of a population of 13 million). Most important, it is also the first Indian state to have elected a Communist government.

Whether or not it will be the last to do so depends upon a number of factors: the kind of record the Communists make while they are in office; the extent to which the democratic parties face up to the Communist internal political threat, and the ability of the National Government to satisfy the expectations of India's 400 million people during the next few years.

Kerala's Communists were voted into power in 1957 with 35 percent of the vote against a divided and inept opposition. People were fed up with a succession of do-nothing or alleged corrupt administrations and dissatisfied because land reform had not been carried out. Many decided the Communists should be given a chance to deliver on their promises to get things done better and differently.

Comparisons with Europe

So I came down here both to see how they are doing and to learn whether they are any different from the Communists I knew in Europe and the Soviet Union.

It is immediately obvious that they are the same breed, taking their lead from Moscow. At first they tried rough tactics, intimidating their opponents and calling a political strike against the tea planters. Since this almost led to intervention by the Central Government—which is authorized by the Constitution to safeguard civil liberties—they have lately been behaving more carefully.

Today, Kerala's press is free—and 75 percent anti-Communist; the judges on the high court—to whom anyone may appeal—are appointed from New Delhi. But it is clear that the Communists are only biding time.

This emerged in the course of a revealing talk I had with Communist Chief Minister E. M. S. Namboodiripad. He had just returned from Moscow, where he was an important member of the Indian delegation to the 21st party congress. (In China, I am told, they already talk of the "two Indias"—Nehru's and Namboodiripad's.) I found him affable but evasive. Each time I asked him why India's Communists did not press harder for a Soviet pattern of society—such as Chinese-style communes—he would reply, "not yet" or "not under the present circumstances."

Finally I suggested that India's democratic Constitution might be an obstacle. He agreed. So I pressed him: Would India's Communists change the Constitution and transform India into a true, tough people's democracy if they ever got the chance? Mr. Namboodiripad smiled broadly.

"Look at it this way," he said. "If a Hindu believes he will be reincarnated in his next life as a dog—does that mean he should start barking now?"

Kerala's Communists are not barking yet, but they are busy digging in, supporting the Communist labor unions, building a network of party workers that already reaches into most of Kerala's 30,000 villages.

Unable so far to fulfill their campaign promises—such as a 25-percent wage increase—they hope to win a decisive majority in the 1962 elections by means of a disciplined organization able to dispense patronage and favors, old-fashioned Tammany style, where they will do the most good.

What are their changes of holding Kerala and perhaps winning control of some other states? I think there are grounds for concern. It's true that the myth of Communist efficiency has been exploded here. Kerala's chronic food shortage and unemployment problems remain unsolved. Many people are disillusioned.

Many have grievances

University students, plantation workers, and educators all have grievances against the administration—the latter because of a new law giving the state greater control over private schools.

Nevertheless, I think it would be a mistake to underestimate the party's organizational efforts. More than 60,000 party members—many of them on a monthly payroll—are hard at work every day convincing people that this is their government. Party leaders are more accessible to the people than their predecessors and live more simply.

Although it is conceded they are personally honest, there are indications they are building up a substantial party war chest through manipulation of government contracts. They are also promoting farm and labor cooperatives to which contracts are given without competitive bids. They take credit for land reform. And when things go wrong they can always blame the Central Government in New Delhi.

Opinions differ as to the outcome of Kerala's next elections in 1962. Congress and Praja Socialist Party leaders, now ready to work together, believe they could upset the Communists' two-seat majority in the Assembly if the vote took place this year. But many fear that 3 more years of Communist entrenchment will make their job harder.

Meanwhile, the Communists told me they expected not only to hold Kerala but hoped to take over two or three other states.

Thanks to well-trained leaders and ample funds, their trade unions are growing in strength and influence at the expense of non-Communist labor groups, and if India's economy falters, the Communists are in a position to benefit from popular discontent.

Dangers recognized

Fortunately, India's leaders are aware of the dangers. Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru himself is urging the Congress Party not to be complacent after 12 years in office—to press on with land reform, service cooperatives, local industries and community development programs.

There are strong factors working to reinforce democracy in India. The benefits of its 5-year plans are generally affecting more and more people; and I believe there is an increasing awareness, particularly among intellectuals, that communism is the real enemy of India's democratic institutions.

In the long run, the Kerala experience may well prove to have been of value in stimulating India's democratic forces to greater efforts to preserve the freedoms and independence that India has so recently won.

ARTICLE IV. FOREIGN AID HELD CRUCIAL TO INDIA

NEW DELHI, INDIA.—At 69, Jawaharlal Nehru is, as ever, a man with a purpose. After devoting so many years of his life—including 13 in British jails—to securing India's political independence, his ambition today is to lead his country to what he calls economic independence. He hopes this will be accomplished during India's third 5-year plan, ending in 1966. And he has put aside any thoughts of retiring—even briefly—as he had proposed to do last year.

He told me this during our last talk together before I left India. I found his knowledge of even the details of India's economy impressive in a man burdened with so many responsibilities. And he does not underestimate India's enormous problems. As he remarked, "It takes an elephant a long time to get up."

There is no doubt that Nehru would welcome substantial U.S. aid to put the Indian elephant on its feet—that is, to make it possible to plan ahead with assurance for the third plan. But he is a proud man who does not like to ask directly for help. To my question about India's need, he replied, "A little foreign aid will only keep us where we are. To be really effective, foreign loans—from all sources—must be sufficient to get our economy off the ground. Now that we have built a sound base, we must make our economy dynamic and self-generating so that further expansion can come from our own resources."

Nehru calls himself a Socialist. But, as I observed, he is on record as saying that the state, which already wields great political power, should not also concentrate too much economic power in its hands. So I asked him about the future of private enterprise in India's planned economy. He replied that he was in favor of as much decentralization as possible, and that private industry could and should play an important part in the nation's development.

And what if the 5-year plans do not succeed? Would the Indian people turn to communism?

"Our people who vote Communist do so because they are disgruntled," he said. "So we must succeed."

Nehru prefers affirmative way

I told him that I had read his speeches and statements to intellectual groups in India stressing the basic difference between the Communist and democratic philosophies. But I wondered why he did not do more to explain to the mass of voters the real objectives of communism.

"It is not the Indian way," he said. "My attacking communism would do more harm than good. We must be affirmative. We must emphasize the human values of a free society and show our people what can be accomplished under democracy."

I leave India reassured that democracy is secure so long as Nehru is its leader. His power with the masses rests on an inspirational as well as a political foundation. He is trusted and revered as Gandhi's successor. But what will happen when he, too, goes?

Some Indians I have met believe that his absence would actually strengthen Indian democracy by releasing the energies of men whose initiative is overshadowed by Nehru's domination of all aspects of government policy. Others say that Nehru's leadership is essential for the next few years to prevent conservative elements taking over the Congress party and slowing down the pace of the decisive third 5-year plan.

But I have found general agreement that democracy would survive Nehru. There are other men capable of taking over the reins.

India has four big problems

What really counts is whether the nation's economy develops fast enough to satisfy popular expectations. And right now, India faces four major problems, all of them interrelated:

The first is food. To provide adequate food for its growing population, India needs to increase its annual production of food grains from less than 70 million to at least 100 million tons by 1966. But to achieve this, the Government must not only teach farmers how to produce more but provide them with incentives so that they will want to produce more. These include price supports, better marketing and storage facilities, adequate credit, and better transportation. All this will require substantial investment, along with more fertilizer plants and irrigation, reclamation and flood control projects.

The second problem is employment. Tens of millions of people both in cities and villages are either unemployed or underemployed. To provide jobs for them, there is a need to stimulate both handicraft and small industries capable of making everything from cotton cloth to bicycles. These will also fill increasing demands for consumer goods and reduce India's dependence on imports. But this, too, will require investment as well as training.

Third, there is the growing political influence of the Communist Party. Though still small, with only 10 percent of the vote in 1957, it is the most disciplined and best organized opposition to the ruling Congress Party, and it capitalizes on popular discontent and lethargy among Congress leaders as well as in the labor unions. The lesson of Kerala State, where voters decided to give the Communists a chance to run things, may cause the Congress and Socialists Parties to bestir themselves. But the essential insurance against communism is social and economic progress. Democracy is safe if farmers get security of land tenure and incentive to produce, and if the "educated unemployed" of the cities no longer feel cheated by a society as yet unable to use their skills.

Finally, basic to all these problems is India's need of foreign exchange to buy the equipment and the materials for this rapid and revolutionary transition from an underdeveloped to a self-generating economy by 1966.

This need is estimated as between $500 million and $1 billion a year. Here is where the United States and other industrial nations can help with long-term loans which will permit India to go forward with confidence. As a Nation, we have already invested $1,600 million in India's future. Now that we know it has been well used, the decision facing us today is whether we are prepared to do our share to help India finish the job.

As part of this investment, we should spend more money on our information program. The entire U.S. Information Service budget for India is only $2,500,000 a year at a time when the Russians are spending at least this on publications alone. Our American representatives and technical advisers are doing a first rate job in India, but we need to expand our exchange program so that more Indian leaders and opinion makers can see America at first hand. (Those who come—and only 20 leader grants were available last year—invariably return impressed with what they have seen.) We need more up-to-date documentary films to reach a people still 80 percent illiterate. We cannot depend on Hollywood films to tell the real American story, for too many convey a distorted and unattractive image.

Leaders dedicated

One cannot travel from one end of India to the other, as I have for the past month, without being deeply impressed by the dedication of its leaders to the same principles of freedom and democracy to which we subscribe. Their policy of nonalinement is one that we should try to understand, remembering that for 150 years after independence we tried to isolate ourselves from the world's conflicts.

What happens in India is important to free men everywhere because the course of events in Asia will be decisively affected by India's ability to make democracy work in a revolutionary climate. Can it provide the food, the jobs, and the hopes for a better life that an awakened continent is demanding? And can it provide these things and freedom too? If not, there is little doubt that Asia will turn impatiently to Red China and accept regimentation as the only way to get things done.

The stakes are high in India today, but so is the price of failure.

Nehru hopeful for summit conference

In my discussion with Nehru we covered a wide range of world problems, including Canadian Liberal Leader Lester Pearson's suggestion that he, Nehru, call a summit conference. He replied that he didn't see how he could be helpful, but that he hoped a summit conference would take place. It was his opinion that Khrushchev definitely wanted to relieve tensions and find a way toward a reduction in armaments.

ARTICLE V. HARRIMAN URGES U.S. SHIFT IN ASIA

KARACHI, PAKISTAN.—In India I was asked the same question again and again: "Why are you sending Pakistan arms which will be used against us?" Now in Pakistan I get a completely different question: "We are your allies by treaty. Why do you send uncommitted India economic aid that helps them strengthen their army and threaten us?"

The Indian argument is that our military assistance to Pakistan, a member of SEATO and the Baghdad Pact, has forced them to divert badly needed resources to nearly double their military expenditures and thus indirectly offset the benefits of our aid. They claim that Pakistan is politically too unstable to be trusted not to attack.

The Pakistani fear is based on the widespread belief that India maintains its much larger army in order to dominate Moslem Pakistan. As a group of Pakistani newspapermen told me candidly: "We are your allies against communism, but the reason we need American weapons is to defend ourselves against India.

Both sides stress arms

This mutual fear and suspicion have led to heavy military expenditures in both of these hard-pressed countries. Two-thirds of the Pakistan national government's revenue now goes for military expenditures. This is why some $900 million in U.S. aid—mostly grants and not counting military hardware—has gone largely to the military establishment rather than economic growth. And it has deeply disturbed India.

Since the assassination of Prime Minister Liaqat Ali Khan in 1951, Pakistan's problems have been aggravated by a succession of ineffectual governments. This led to a bloodless coup last October which set up a military dictatorship headed by Gen. Mohammad Ayub Khan. Although it is early yet to tell whether the new regime can carry out all its plans, I believe there is good reason for hoping that Pakistan may at last be on the road to political stability, economic progress and eventual democracy.

One reason for optimism is the personality of General Ayub himself. I found him an energetic, well-informed man, dedicated to improving the life of his people. Ruling under martial law, one of his first moves was to put a stop to the graft and corruption which had long infested Pakistan's bureaucracy. He is also beginning to carry out a long talked of program to build decent housing for the 500,000 refugees now living in squalid hovels in Karachi. There is a new public sense of purpose and respect for government among Pakistan's 86 million people.

Ayub for democracy

In explaining the events that led to his seizure of power last fall, General Ayub told me, "It was not a question of dictatorship versus democracy, but of survival." So far, he considers his government's most important achievement has been to institute long delayed land reforms in West Pakistan which will free millions of farmers from the domination of feudal landlords and thus destroy the latter's political domination.

"This will make it possible to establish a democracy," he stated. I asked him how long it would take Pakistan to develop democratic institutions. He said that within 2 to 2½ years he hoped to have a constitution prepared by a commission to submit for popular ratification. He added that it should be modeled on ours, rather than the British, with a president with broad powers and a fixed term. But he thought, as do others in Asia, that election of top officials by direct popular vote is unrealistic in a young nation three-quarters illiterate; he suggested the possibility of a representative system of elections whereby the national executive and legislative officials would be chosen by locally-elected bodies—in effect, electoral colleges.

Problem of river waters

General Ayub made it plain that he believes Pakistan's overriding problem is India and that the essential first step in neighborly relations would be a settlement of the river waters question. This involves six rivers, three of which flow into west Pakistan from India. The Indian program for irrigation, by diverting water from presently irrigated lands, would strangle Pakistan. Until this issue is settled, Pakistan will continue to distrust India and rely on military strength.

Always in the background is the deadlocked dispute over the status of Kashmir. And then, there are minor border disputes still causing loss of life by military action on both sides. But General Ayub indicated that agreement on the river waters would end the most immediate threat, and other negotiations might follow. "We would gladly be reasonable if the Indians were," he told me, and suggested that the two countries might reduce their military expenditures and ultimately think in terms of common defense instead of defense against each other.

Coming from Pakistan's strong man, this attitude is a new and hopeful sign in a depressing situation. Unlike his predecessors, who often played on popular emotions to consolidate their power, General Ayub appears to be a man with the strength and self-assurance to be moderate. This year, for example, he became the first Pakistani leader to attend the annual celebration of India's national holiday at the Indian High Commission in Karachi. This gesture was favorably noted in New Delhi; it made it easier for Nehru to quiet the uproar in India this month when the new bilateral defense pact between Pakistan and the United States was signed.

The importance of better relations between these two countries, linked together by so much history, cannot be overestimated. They need to trade with each other. (For example, Pakistan should be obtaining more Indian coal instead of going as far afield as Poland and China; and India needs Pakistan jute to keep its mills going.) As partners in the struggle for independence against British rule, they should now be partners in building up their countries and in preserving their freedom against the new colonialism of their Communist neighbors across the Himalayas.

Unhappily, U.S. policies have aggravated rather than eased the situation, and contributed to an arms race detrimental to both countries. In emphasizing the military, the Eisenhower administration has failed to appreciate the urgency of economic progress as democracy's best defense against Communist subversion in this area.

Right now, both sides think we should get tough with the other. The Indians want us to stop arms shipments to Pakistan. And, as one Pakistani told me, "American economic assistance to India should not only have strings attached, but a rope; not another penny until India settles its differences with your ally, Pakistan."

Need to ease tensions

It seems to me that all our efforts should be directed to reducing tensions between India and Pakistan, without antagonizing either side.

The most urgent problem is the issue of the river waters. During the past several years proposals have been made by the World Bank to help finance a canal construction program which would tie the six rivers together in such a way and under such agreements that both countries would get adequate water for their irrigation projets. But there are still disagreements about certain aspects of this program.

A settlement of this question, so vital to life in large areas of both countries, particularly Pakistan, would certainly relieve tensions and form a basis for future settlement of other disputes. After my talks in New Delhi and Karachi, I am satisfied that this is the year in which an agreement can be achieved. As friends of both India and Pakistan, our influence and help can play a decisive role.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, the Kennedy-Ervin so-called labor reform bill has been before the Senate only a few days, but the press of America has already recognized its deficiencies. Newspaper after newspaper has commented on the deficiencies of this approach, and I ask unanimous consent that several of these comments be printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the articles and editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Phoenix (Ariz.) Republic, Mar. 28, 1959]

HALFWAY LABOR REFORM

On January 28 President Eisenhower sent Congress a message regarding proposed labor laws. He recommended legislation aimed at protecting union members as well as the public from unscrupulous union officials. This week, before adjourning for the Easter recess, the Senate Labor Committee approved a Democratic measure designed to protect rank-and-file union members. But the committee refused to sponsor the Republican-backed measures that would protect the public as well. Senator GOLDWATER was one of the minority members who refused to sign the committee report, and he will join Senator DIRKSEN, Republican, of Illinois, in a minority report.

Thus the stage has been set for a knock-down and drag-out fight on the floor of the Senate when it reconvenes in about 10 days. The fight will not be over the so-called Kennedy bill, supported by everyone except a few union goons. The fight will be over the extension of labor reform measures to the broader field of protecting the public.

The Kennedy bill requires unions to make financial reports, to hold elections by secret ballots, to limit the terms of officers, to prohibit criminals from holding union offices, to limit an international union trusteeship to 18 months, and to ban picketing for purposes of extortion.

Most unions already have secret ballots, limited terms, etc. But the McClellan committee hearings found some in which officers were elected by a show of hands, assuring the victory to the candidate with the strongest arm. The hearings uncovered unions in which officers held office virtually for life, never being forced to run in an election.

In some cases international trusteeships of supposedly corrupt locals had existed for years without check.

Other unions had used millions of dollars in pension funds without making reports. Confirmed convicts were presidents of locals which had to pay dues to support their bosses in the flesh pots of Miami. All of these things are admittedly bad. The Kennedy bill may not cure them, but its provisions will give the rank-and-file union members the tools with which they can clean house if they wish to do so. The honest labor leaders support the Kennedy bill. So do President Eisenhower, Secretary of Labor Mitchell, Senator Goldwater, and the Republican Party.

But if Congress passes only the Kennedy bill it will be stopping half-way down the road to labor law reform. To travel the other half of the distance will require enactment of the provisions in the Goldwater bill, which would accomplish three major objectives.

First, it would strengthen existing laws on secondary boycotts by preventing coercion against an employer who is not directly engaged in a strike. Second, it would prevent "blackmail picketing," in cases where an employer already has recognized one union, or a representation election has been held in the past year, or when the picketing union cannot show that the employees it seeks to represent are interested in joining. Finally, in the so-called no man's land of industrial disputes, the Goldwater bill would permit the NLRB to decline cases it considers unimportant and would permit the States to assume jurisdiction in these cases.

Senator Kennedy agrees that there may be merit in some of these provisions, but he doesn't want to get them mixed up with the "democratization" legislation that his committee has approved. Most labor leaders simply don't want the Goldwater bill at all, since it would cut down their freedom of action in secondary boycotts, jurisdictional disputes, etc. So the Democratic bloc in Congress talks of passing the Kennedy bill now and getting to the Goldwater bill later. Most realists agree that if the two bills don't go together, the Goldwater amendments will be lost in the shuffle.

The post-Easter floor fight should be sharp and decisive. It will prove whether organized labor actually controls a majority of the votes in the Upper House. If the Goldwater amendments are killed, you will know that Reuther, Meany, et al., are calling the shots in the Senate.

BILL OF PARTICULARS

Members of the Senate Labor Committee are working on legislation to curb the labor rackets exposed by the McClellan investigation. So far, the action does not point toward a very strong bill.

The reluctance of the Democrats on the committee, under pressure from the union lobby, to write a tight law is frightening, in view of the McClellan disclosures. Surely they can hear what Senator JOHN L. MCCLELLAN, chairman of the investigating committee, has been saying.

Just this week, in a New York speech, the Senator spelled out a bill of particulars in support of stronger measures he himself has proposed to correct the abuses revealed by his long inquiry.

"The instability or lack of integrity prevalent today in labor-management relations in this country is appalling," he said.

In the investigation "we have had to deal constantly with people of low character or no character at all." Of 1,200 witnesses so far summoned, more than 200 ducked behind the fifth amendment for fear of incriminating themselves. The evils which have been exposed, he said, "are outrageously cruel, corrupt, and contemptible."

"No legitimate union, properly administered by honest and decent officials, would be penalized to any extent or degree whatsoever," the Senator said. "If these provisions are enacted into law, however, the power and opportunity of crooked labor bosses and criminal elements to continue the abuse and exploitation of union members and working people in this country will be substantially curbed and reduced."

That's the issue: Whether union members and their families, the public, and decent union officials will be protected; or whether, by not passing such measures, Congress continues to protect the mobsters, thieves, extortionists, and murderers exposed by the McClellan committee.

How can any honest and decent union official, or Senators of like attributes, hesitate about on which side they stand?

THE PUBLIC INTEREST COMES FIRST

President Meany of the AFL–CIO has denounced the Eisenhower administration's labor reform bill as stupid and antilabor. In testimony before the House Labor Subcommittee, he contended the administration bill represents a deliberate attempt to obscure the issues.

Mr. Meany favors—with some reservations—the Kennedy-Ervin bill introduced in the Senate. This deals mainly with protection of union funds and other safeguards against racketeering. The administration measure has similar provisions, but it would deal more severely with blackmail picketing. It proposes to ban picketing of a plant in the absence of evidence of sufficient interest in union membership among employees.

But there is a much more significant difference between the bills. This has to do with secondary boycotts. Despite the prohibition of the Taft-Hartley Act, it is possible for a union to force employers with whom it has no dispute to stop doing business with a concern against whom it has called a strike. The administration bill seeks to close Taft-Hartley loopholes which permit this abuse of union power; the Kennedy-Ervin measure would make no change in the existing Taft-Hartley provision.

The power to shut down businesses having no quarrel with a union in order to compel another business to bow to union demands has been used frequently to paralyze a whole industry or a whole section of the country. Under no circumstances can such monopoly power in the hands of labor leaders be defended as in the public interest. The public welfare must take precedence over union interest. To claim that legislation aimed at preserving that principle is antiunion is simply befogging the issue.

WISHY-WASHY LABOR LAW

A new labor bill offered to Congress is practically the twin brother of the Kennedy-Ives bill of last session. The measure was pushed through the Senate on a hurry-up basis which allowed no time or opportunity for incentive hearings or consideration. It then was defeated in the House—for the simple reason that it just wasn't capable of doing the needed job.

There are good things in the currently proposed measure, just as there were in its predecessor. But the good is heavily outweighed by the negative aspect. To take one example, it would do nothing about two of the worst labor abuses perpetrated on business and the public—secondary boycotts and blackmail picketing.

Newspapers throughout the country are now asking for a stronger bill. An interesting instance is provided by the Richmond Times-Dispatch. The leading southern paper editorially rebuked the House for voting down the Kennedy-Ives bill, on the grounds that any law was better than none. But now it takes a different view. It calls the proposed law wishy-washy, and says: "This year the need to halt the inflationary wage-price spiral is even more urgent. The threat of sympathy strikes and secondary boycotts carries the full weight not only of the striking union, but also the threat inherent in the 16 million membership of the full AFL-CIO syndicate. Therein lies the greatest danger of union monopoly.

"The right to unionize, to bargain collectively and to strike locally should not be impaired (so long as public welfare and national security are not endangered). But unless the threat of nationwide strikes in key industries is removed, the inflationary trend cannot be checked."

The country has the right to a labor law which will protect the legitimate interest of us all, including union members. The Congress has the responsibility to pass such a law.

[From the Washington Daily News, Apr. 17, 1959]

THE HALFWAY DEAL

It is our considered opinion that the majority of union bosses is opposed to any new laws in the labor field. But most of them publicly have accepted a minimum of reform legislation as the best device for fending off sterner measures.

As the Senate begins debate on this issue, the pattern is apparent. It is this: To pass what the union bosses will accept, but no more.

The Senate Labor Committee was completely in hand in this respect. It voted, 13 to 2, to report the Kennedy bill, which the union bosses have endorsed. It rejected all stiffening amendments.

Now the strategic excuses are being offered.

The Labor Committee report said only a few unions have been involved in the abuses exposed by the Senate's own special investigators for the McClellan committee.

Senator KENNEDY said any tougher legislation might lead to no legislation at all. It was he, too, who advised against any Federal laws against arson, assault or other violence—this, he said, being a responsibility of the States.

These things do not agree with the report of Senator MCCLELLAN, who has been in charge of the labor rackets investigation more than 2 years.

He said crookedness was prevalent. The list of crimes against union members and against the public fills volumes of testimony.

These crimes are no less vicious because they were not committed by honest union leaders. The reforms are not aimed at such people—they are aimed at the mobsters, thieves, extortionists and even murderers Senator MCCLELLAN has been exposing.

And why is it local law enforcement machinery has not been adequate against crimes committed in the name of labor unions? It is because Congress by law has given them a power and a sanctity not enjoyed by other segments of society.

The abuses the MCCLELLAN committee has revealed were made possible by the privileges, without safeguards, which Congress bestowed indiscriminately on union bosses—by law. No halfway propositions can undo this damage.

[From the Washington Evening Star, Apr. 17, 1959]

LINES DRAWN FOR BATTLE

Against a background of bitterly contradictory assertions and the unusual spectacle of cosponsors of the pending legislation being in disagreement, the Senate has plunged into the controversial issue of labor reform.

First major test on the subject will come early next week when the Chamber will vote on an amendment offered by Senator ERVIN, North Carolina Democrat and cosponsor, to delete from the bill a section containing labor-approved revisions of the Taft-Hartley Act. The disputed section, title VI, would permit displaced strikers to vote in representation elections and would loosen regulations on building trades unions. President Meany of the AFL–CIO already has threatened that the federation will oppose the bill if title VI is eliminated. Senator KENNEDY, Massachusetts Democrat and original sponsor of the legislation, has warned that any revision on the floor poses a grave risk of killing all prospect for reform action.

Along with this controversy within controversy, there is the broader dispute on whether the pending measure offers any effective reform at all. Mr. KENNEDY says it will do the job and that if passed "the Jimmy Hoffas and their ilk will be on the way out." Senator GOLDWATER, Arizona Republican, describes the Kennedy bill as completely inadequate and has offered an analysis critical of virtually every section. Senator MCCLELLAN, Arkansas Democrat whose special committee has uncovered some of the worst of the corrupt union practices, has offered five proposals—not in the Kennedy bill—which he says represent "the minimum that is required to provide an adequate legislative remedy for conditions that now prevail." Among the McClellan recommendations are prohibitions against secondary boycotts and blackmail picketing—two high-priority recommendations in the administration's labor reform program.

It is obvious that the political power of labor is apt to be the determining factor in whether there is to be reform legislation this year, and, if so, what its final shape will be. In the long term, however, labor's special interests are inextricably related to the general welfare rather than to the corrupt designs of those whom Senator MCCLELLAN has described as brutal, cynical men to whom unionism means only a royal road to personal riches and power. Whether in one legislative package or more, Congress should find the courage to serve these real interests.

HIS REFORM BILL QUESTIONED: KENNEDY RISKS BEING BEHOLDEN TO LABOR

(By Holmes Alexander)

WASHINGTON, D.C.—Senator JACK KENNEDY, front runner for the Democratic presidential nomination, owes his early lead to energy and a winning personality. But the way things are going, he could find himself more beholden to the American labor movement than a successful candidate in America ought to be.

The prospects of three other presidential possibilities have been recently explored in this place. RICHARD NIXON's forte is experience and an open record; STUART SYMINGTON's is a proved ability in business management and labor relations; LYNDON JOHNSON's is leadership and parliamentary skill. But KENNEDY stands out as the favorite of the AFL–CIO, the spokesman for pro-labor legislation, and the gadfly of the pro-business opposition.

FRIENDLY WARNING

All this is confusing and unfortunate. Senator KENNEDY is not a laborite or a leftist. Nothing about him deserves the Republican epithets of "radical"—meaning in NIXON's language, an extremist. But it may be—and this is written in friendship and warning—that KENNEDY and his backers don't realize how far toward the precipice the Senator's labor reform bill (S. 505) is taking them.

The Senator, for example, has been forced by competition to take a position which opposes making union officers criminally responsible for misusing union funds. True, the Kennedy bill does not blacklist "fiduciary responsibility," which is the legal phrase. But of the four principal labor reform bills now before Congress, only the Kennedy bill fails to include a fiduciary provision.

The Kennedy bill is much softer than its three competitors in the matter of financial disclosure by union officers. The Kennedy measure relies on criminal procedures, while the Goldwater-administration bill (S. 748) would provide actions of disapproval by the Labor Department and the National Labor Relations Board. Two other bills by Senator MCCLELLAN (S. 1137) and Congressman BARDEN (H.R. 4473) go still further. They require that the union financial reports be certified by a certified public accountant.

KENNEDY's bill includes a difficult legal obstacle for the removal of a union officer by vote of the union members. There is a "show cause" phrase in the Kennedy bill which is significantly left out of the bill by MCCLELLAN, whose committee has interviewed so many slippery characters. Again, the Kennedy bill is unlike the bills by GOLDWATER, MCCLELLAN, and BARDEN in the matter of protecting union members from threats and violence by union officers and goons.

FOR FEDERAL SWAP

The Kennedy bill tends to federalize jurisdiction over labor affairs which now lie in the no-man's land between Washington and the States. Two of the other three bills favor States rights when in doubt and the fourth bill does not take up the subject. The Kennedy bill deals very gingerly with labor picketing and deals not at all with secondary boycotts, two matters on which the AFL–CIO is very touchy.

In virtually every case KENNEDY does what the labor leaders desire, or will tolerate, and what the business community regards as undesirable and often intolerable. This may not be so bad. Labor is entitled to liberal champions in Congress, but there is reason to feel that some of the KENNEDY positions are harmful not merely to business, but to the public interests. This appears to be true in places where the Kennedy bill fails to go as far in protective language as the McClellan bill.

THE POLITICAL SCENE: CONGRESS WON'T HALT UNION CRIME

(By David Lawrence)

WASHINGTON.—The American people may not realize it yet, but the Congress isn't going to do anything at this session that really will put an end to the racketeering in labor unions. This is already conceded privately by the leaders on both sides.

Actually, none of the proposed measures, even if passed, would eliminate the corruption that has been exposed at the hearings conducted by Senator MCCLELLAN and his committee.

One of the most significant comments has just come from George Meany, president of the AFL–CIO. In an interview in the current issue of Dun's Review and Modern Industry, Mr. Meany pointed out that the unions alone cannot stop the abuses. Here is an excerpt:

Question. Do you believe that the labor legislation now pending in the Congress will provide adequate power to curb these abuses?

Answer. Adequate power? Frankly, these abuses could not be stopped by the unions alone. The trade-union movement is trying to do what it can in this field. We think we have some moral responsibility to do this. But the AFL–CIO has no legal responsibility to curb corruption in union locals. We aren't a law-enforcement agency, and we don't have the power of subpena. We couldn't possibly call a trade-union official before our council and say, "We are suspicious; we don't like the way things are going." Certainly, we would not hesitate to take action where we had proof of wrongdoing or corruption. But we must have the proof, and we haven't got the machinery to go out and make these investigations.

So, to answer your question, we don't feel that the requirements of the Kennedy-Ervin bill would eliminate corruption. We do think it would curb some of these people because they will have to report all their financial transactions. We think the Kennedy-Ervin bill is a step in the right direction, but the real problem of corruption is the failure of the law enforcement authorities to act. The jukebox and coin-machine business points it up quite clearly. Here's one of our big industries, in the billion-dollar class, and it's honeycombed with gangsters and thugs operating with the connivance of greedy businessmen and with the cognizance of the law enforcement authorities.

"It is quite obvious that the real answer to corruption, whether in unions or anywhere else, is better law enforcement. Nobody runs to the American Bankers Association every time a cashier defaults or somebody on the inside robs a bank—they expect the local district attorney to handle that. When companies engage in business frauds, nobody runs to the chamber of commerce or the National Association of Manufacturers and says, 'What are you going to do about law enforcement?' No, they expect the local district attorney to do it."

This correspondent read the foregoing quotation to Senator MCCLELLAN and asked him for his opinion on it. The Arkansas Senator said:

"They say they do not have the power, and that is correct. They can't stop a Hoffa. That's why laws are needed. If they had the power, and would be diligent in exercising it, we probably wouldn't need additional laws, or so many laws. But they cannot deal with people like Hoffa, and it's imperative that we enact laws to at least curb—you never completely prevent crime of any kind."

Question. "I wonder why the local district attorneys haven't done more on this?"

Answer. "I think the simple answer to that is, politics. They control—just like they control an industry or control an operation. They have the political power where they control often the people in public office."

Question. "You mean the unions do?"

Answer. "Sure. Or the union racketeers—that element in them. There's no question about that."

All this points up to the fact that labor unions are not at all analogous to trade associations or groups of businesses. The labor unions have a monopoly power. They get it out of existing laws and also out of the refusal of Congress to include labor unions as within the jurisdiction of antimonopoly or antitrust laws.

Labor unions have not only a monopoly power in being able to fix wages in an entire industry, but they have a monopoly power with respect to memberships. In some lines, they can prevent an applicant from getting a job. They can force a member out of a union through various devices and deprive him of his means of livelihood. This type of potential coercion makes it difficult for anyone who is aware of corruption to give testimony to the law enforcement authorities for fear of punishment by union officials. No such power over the individual is held by any other trade organization or private association of any kind.

Obviously, it is the duty of States to preserve order and punish crimes within their borders. But when wrongdoing is of an interstate character—and virtually all the unions have been placed under interstate commerce by acts of Congress and by judicial decisions—it would appear that ultimately Federal legislation will be necessary. In fact, Congress enacted several years ago the first of its antiracketeering statutes, and these have never been held to be an improper exercise of Federal authority.

PRESENT LABOR BILLS IGNORING REAL EVILS

People of almost every community in the country have a decided interest in what transpires in this session of Congress with reference to labor bills—particularly in regard to the monopolistic power of the big union labor organizations.

Two labor bills are now before Congress. One is the administration's bill, the other is known as the Kennedy-Ives bill which was defeated by the House of Representatives last year.

The primary purpose of these two proposals before Congress at this time seems to be to protect the rank-and-file union membership from corrupt union officials. The sordid revelations produced by the McClellan committee's investigations into labor racketeering have demonstrated a crying need for that, even though this touches only a part of the labor trouble.

The other side, one of vital and perhaps even more importance in the long view, was recently dealt with by Henry Hazlitt in one of his Newsweek columns. He writes: "The two labor bills * * * merely serve to deflect public attention away from the real evils of uncurbed union power. They seem to be drafted mainly on the assumption that labor bosses can do no wrong except to union members. The plight of nonunion workers, employers, and the consuming public is largely ignored. The central evils of legalized violence and monopolistic compulsion are left untouched."

The general public, which more and more has been noting the extremes to which various big labor leaders have been going, undoubtedly is inclined to agree with Mr. Hazlitt when he adds that "real steps to reform would be amendment of the Taft-Hartley Act to remove the exclusive bargaining powers granted to unions, and to prohibit all devices that tie employment to union membership."

In other words, if every form of corruption, dishonesty, and unethical practices within the unions disappeared tomorrow, and if all union affairs were administered on a level of unquestioned purity with reference to leaders' treatment of union members, really important abuses would remain.

Union monopoly and the union power to coerce and dictate, are left untouched by the proposed laws. No law in this connection, is now before Congress which pays more than feeble lipservice to the real public interest.

Years ago when that sort of thing was happening in big business with its monopolistic activities, corrective legislation was speedily passed to curtail abuses. Why should the now powerful labor organizations not be treated in the same manner for the sake of public welfare?

LOCAL INITIATIVE AND PRIVATE ENTERPRISE IS REVITALIZING ROCHESTER, N.Y.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, one of the growing challenges confronting our Nation is that of the future of our urban centers. The increasing demand for services by city dwellers, their increasing cost, and the decay of many downtown areas across the land, have posed tremendous problems for our larger cities. The reaction to such situations has varied from place to place.

Some cities have turned immediately to the Federal Government for assistance. Others have taken the view that State governments should do whatever rebuilding is needed. Finally, a great many cities have decided that this is a problem they themselves must face squarely; that this is a challenge which must be answered by local leadership, local financing, and local action.

A splendid case in point is Rochester, N.Y. In the post-World War II years the city has taken a number of progressive steps to revitalize its downtown area, to eradicate slums and architectural decay, and rebuild a city of which all residents can be proud.

It is important to note that the already outstanding results are largely the product of local leadership and funds and increasingly vigorous support from private enterprise sources. Enlightened cooperation of all parties concerned, based on voluntary compliance and good, plain, hard work, has paid rich dividends.

The city's downtown is now literally a place reborn, a showplace other cities of our Nation could well study and emulate. My hat is off to the governmental and civic leaders who have produced this modern-day miracle. They have demonstrated that not all the answers to local problems must be sought in Albany or Washington.

The story of Rochester's rehabilitation program was graphically outlined recently by Robert P. Aex, the city's city manager, and one of the stalwarts in this surge of progress. In an article published in the March issue of New York State Taxpayer, he tells something of the ingredients which went into this successful municipal improvement program. It is fitting that Mr. Aex's remarks should be printed in this publication, for its sponsor, the Citizens Public Expenditure Survey, has long stood in the forefront of efforts to limit extravagance in government spending and insure that each taxpayer receives the maximum benefits for his tax contributions. I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ROCHESTER CITY MANAGER TRACES STEPS IN DOWNTOWN REHABILITATION PROGRAM

(By Robert P. Aex, city manager of Rochester)

Rochester, the third largest city in New York State, is a typical eastern city which has grown old and has been showing the signs of old age. The community was settled almost 150 years ago, and Rochester became an incorporated city 125 years ago.

According to Blake McKelvey, city historian, the rapidity of Rochester's growth in the 1820's made it America's first boomtown. The blooming gardens, attractive cottages and pretentious mansions in Rochester in post-Civil War days attracted many visitors.

By 1890, visitors were displaying even a greater interest in the remarkably simple Kodak of the Eastman Kodak Co. By the turn of the century, Rochester was known as the Kodak city.

After 100 years of prosperous growth and development, Rochester decided it needed modernization. Ten years ago, the city undertook the most ambitious public improvement in its history. This program was aimed at modernizing municipal service and encouraging private enterprise to act in a downtown redevelopment program.

ARTERIAL HIGHWAYS

The construction of new arterial highways has been authorized each year since 1950. Rochester's arterial highway program includes the construction of an inner loop which circles the central downtown business district and an outer loop which circles the city. Connecting links between the inner loop and the outer loop complete the plan for a new arterial highway system to serve the city and the metropolitan area.

OFFSTREET PARKING

The population in the metropolitan area extends far beyond the reaches of the public transit system. Therefore, the municipal improvement program for revitalizing the downtown area includes the construction of places for people to park their cars after they have used the new highways to get downtown.

Modern parking accommodations in the form of parking ramps today provide deluxe parking service at reasonable rates. Rates are as low as 5 cents per hour.

One parking ramp, a 523-car, eight-level unit, handled 65,000 cars in the 4 weeks between Thanksgiving and Christmas 1958. Every car contained a shopper because long-term parking is prohibited.

CIVIC CENTER

In July 1954, the governments of the city of Rochester and the county of Monroe approved a site in the downtown area for a proposed city-county civic center in an area of the city which had deteriorated in recent years.

The completion of the Civic Center which is already under construction, will bring the units of city and county government together in one place and will greatly aid and improve the administration of local government for both the city and the county.

REHABILITATION

The rehabilitation of individual homes, old streets, and even whole sections of the city was undertaken by the city's rehabilitation commission in 1955. A hygiene of housing ordinance was adopted and residential rehabilitation throughout the city has progressed at a rapid rate.

The key to the rehabilitation program is voluntary compliance by landlords, but the housing ordinance has teeth in it which can be used when necessary. In 1957, Rochester was selected as one of the nine cities in the United States with a most outstanding rehabilitation program, and it received a Home Achievement Award from Look magazine.

Rochester's downtown redevelopment program is based upon the belief that private enterprise must play the major role in the demolition of old structures and the building of new ones. The municipal improvement program, ambitious as it is would never be sufficient to do the job. Even with State and Federal aid, there would not be enough local tax resources to underwrite such a program.

Slowly, but steadily, private enterprise has responded. New buildings have been constructed in the downtown area, and old buildings have been remodeled and restored.

MIDTOWN PLAZA PROJECT

On September 26, 1958, local newspapers announced a private enterprise project called Midtown Plaza (see October 1958 Taxpayer). It is geared toward revitalizing downtown Rochester and checking the decentralization of shopping. Midtown Plaza is unique in that it is basically an urban renewal project by private enterprise without government subsidy.

The project anticipates the expansion of the present McCurdy & Co. and B. Forman Co. retail stores, 25 or 30 new retail shops, an 18-story office building and a bus terminal. All this is to be designed, constructed and financed by private enterprise. All land required for the shopping plaza has been acquired by the private interests.

The city's cooperation in the Midtown project has been carefully studied. The municipal investment in the construction of streets, relocation of water lines and sewers, and an underground garage has been evaluated as "self-liquidating."

NEW HOTEL

On January 10, 1959, the Hotel Corp. of America announced its intention to construct a new $6 million hotel in Rochester.

The additional revenue in taxes which the city government, the city schools and the county government will receive from the private construction in Midtown Plaza and the new hotel removes all doubt as to whether the municipal projects, undertaken in cooperation with the private Midtown Plaza project, will be self-liquidating.

When the proposed new hotel was announced, Mayor Peter Barry said, "The announcement of a new hotel of a different type for downtown Rochester is exactly the type of result for which we have been working. It is this sort of private investment and renewal of our commercial area which we feel will bring about a literal rebirth of Rochester's downtown.

THE BYELORUSSIAN NATIONAL REPUBLIC

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, on the 25th of March 1918, there came into being a free republic known as the Byelorussian National Republic. Its life was very, very short indeed. It was then consolidated and incorporated in the Soviet Union.

The arrival of March 25 each year does call attention to and does bring to mind the rich contributions which the citizens of Byelorussian descent in this country have made to the cultural heritage of this Republic. Here, as elsewhere, they have striven to keep alive their traditions and their unquenchable love of freedom; and in doing so they have contributed greatly to the lives of all Americans.

Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois.

CHRISTIAN ARCHIBALD HERTER

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I should like to say a word about the new Secretary of State, Christian Archibald Herter.

The new Secretary of State is 64. He was born on March 28, 1895. At his birth, Grover Cleveland was in the White House and Adlai Stevension, Sr., presided over the Senate. Mr. Herter was born in Paris. Both his father and mother were artists. He received his preparatory education in France and returned to the United States to graduate from Harvard cum laude in 1915.

His ambition was to be an architect. He abandoned his course and joined the Foreign Service as an Embassy attaché in Berlin in 1916.

Being too tall for his weight, he was rejected for military service in World War I and became a special assistant in the State Department in 1917.

Few persons have had such a variety of experience to equip them for the duties which Chris Herter is now called upon to assume.

He negotiated a prisoner-of-war agreement with Germany after World War I. He was Secretary to our Peace Mission in Paris in 1918–19. In 1919, he became Secretary to the American Relief Administration under Herbert Hoover. He became Executive Secretary of the European Relief Council. He fought communism with food for refugees and prisoners of war. When Herbert Hoover became Secretary of Commerce in 1921, Chris Herter was chosen as his assistant.

For a number of years he was a publisher, editor, and lecturer, and lectured at Harvard on international relations in 1929 and 1930.

In 1931, public service claimed him again.

For 12 years, he served in the Massachusetts General Court or Assembly and was selected speaker of the house for 4 years. Then came four terms in Congress. In his first election he won by 2,900; in his fourth election, he won by 67,000. I served with Chris Herter in the House.

In 1947, Chris Herter proposed to Congress a Select Committee on European Aid to get first-hand information on the proposal of General Marshall, then Secretary of State for a Marshall plan. I saw Chris Herter's work in Europe and can testify to the skillful approach he made to this problem. I was chairman of a committee in Europe at the time.

From Congress, Chris Herter went to the governorship of Massachusetts for two terms. Thereafter he came to Washington as Under Secretary of State and took over those duties in February of 1957.

He is the father of 4 children, the grandfather of 12, and holds honorary degrees from 16 universities.

Many Members of the Senate served with Chris Herter when he was in the House of Representatives. This we know of him: He is a scholar. He is thorough. He has the background and talent for his new responsibilities. He possesses that most uncommon of all virtues, common sense. He is a dedicated patriot. He is friendly. He has moral courage and he will serve honorably and with distinction in the finest tradition of those who have preceded him as Secretaries of State, from Thomas Jefferson to John Foster Dulles.

JOHN FOSTER DULLES

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, when I heard of Secretary Dulles' resignation and the appointment of Mr. Herter, I issued a news release in relation to Mr. Herter. As has been stated, he is a man of character and ability. This he demonstrated in the House of Representatives and as Governor of a great State. He demonstrated it again, sitting at the feet of one of the greatest men America has produced, John Foster Dulles.

An editorial entitled "A Fighter for Freedom Retires," was published in Business Week of April 18, 1959. It reads in part as follows:

> With the resignation of Secretary of State John Foster Dulles, the free world has lost the invaluable services of one of its most powerful and effective advocates. His task, as he saw it, was to preserve peace and freedom in the world. And to that high purpose, Dulles selflessly devoted his vast knowledge and boundless energy.

I ask that the entire editorial be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A FIGHTER FOR FREEDOM RETIRES

With the resignation of Secretary of State John Foster Dulles, the free world has lost the invaluable services of one of its most powerful and effective advocates. His task, as he saw it, was to preserve peace and freedom in the world. And to that high purpose, Dulles selflessly devoted his vast knowledge and boundless energy.

Although controversy raged about him much of the time, he pursued his labors with the calm, relentless air of a man who had dedicated himself to a just cause and intended to follow the path of duty wherever it might lead. It was this quality, no less than his exacting mind and wide experience in foreign affairs, that gave him the unchallenged leadership of the West in the worldwide struggle against Communist expansion.

Dulles has never faltered in his belief that the free world must meet Soviet aggression with boldness and courage, that appeasement would only increase the danger of war. From his knowledge of the origins of World Wars I and II, he derived a strong conviction that the Communists must never be left in any doubt about our capacity, and our will, to meet any outright aggression with force.

His formulation of this policy frequently frightened the timid and less farsighted. His phrase "massive retaliation" aroused a furor at home and abroad among many who failed to realize that Dulles was talking the only language the Communists could understand. When he frankly said that in dealing with such a foe we had to be ready to go to the brink of war, his enemies used the epithet "brinkmanship" in an effort to tear him down. Yet, today, it is generally recognized that Communist ambitions can be held in check only by our retailiatory power and by our determination to use it as a last resort rather than to surrender our principles.

For all his toughness, Dulles has never been a warmonger. At least once, in his early days in office, the idea of preventive war was presented to him as a possible answer to the Soviet menace. He rejected such a course as repugnant to the whole American tradition. He has been convinced that if the United States maintained both its power and its principles, we could win the East-West struggle without subjecting the world to a holocaust. And his record proves what a master he was in the difficult art of keeping an appropriate balance between power and principle—the two essential attributes of an effective foreign policy in a democratic nation.

If Dulles often seemed rigid in his diplomatic approach, it was not because he was inflexible, as so often charged. In beginning to prepare the U.S. position on Berlin, just before he was stricken down, he showed himself ready for a flexible approach to Soviet demands—one that would allow for the power realities in Berlin and still preserve basic Western rights there.

Like many another American Secretary of States before him, Dulles has had to bear the slings and arrows of partisan attack at home. From abroad he has had to meet a constant stream of poisonous propaganda from the foe and more than a few malicious barbs from our allies. Fortunately, he always has had the unfailing support of President Eisenhower. And though he may have been prone to run a one-man show at the State Department, he also has had the loyal support of an able group of assistants.

Perhaps the most extraordinary tribute to Dulles came when the nature of his illness was revealed some 2 months ago. Almost overnight his detractors began to speak and write of him as an "indispensable man."

To serve his country and his fellow men everywhere, Dulles has given of his strength without stint. He has earned the respect and gratitude of all Americans. He has set a standard of devotion to duty and high principle that will be an inspiration for those who must now take up the unfinished business of securing peace and freedom in the world.

THE PASSING OF AN ERA IN AMERICAN HISTORY—DEATH OF CHIEF TOMMY THOMPSON

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, Chief Tommy Thompson of the Wy'am Indian tribe was born 5 years before statehood was achieved by my home State in 1859. During the 105 years of his life, Chief Tommy Thompson saw the culture of his people run the full course from the primitive to the present day. He did not approve of all that he saw. He disliked many of the changes from tribal ways.

Chief Tommy also was an outspoken protector of his people's treaty rights. He opposed to the end the loss of fishing rights at Celilo Falls on the Columbia River, where the Dalles Dam flooded out an ancient fishing site. Members of his tribe will long remember his efforts on their behalf. And others who knew of his devotion to his position as tribal Indian chief will long respect the manner in which he discharged those responsibilities.

I ask consent to have printed in the body of the RECORD some informative editorials and news stories from Oregon newspapers about the death of Chief Tommy Thompson.

The editorials are from the Journal of Portland and the Statesman of Salem; the articles are written by Mrs. Ann Sullivan for the Oregonian, of Portland, and by Robert C. Hall, of Hood River, for the Journal. They fill in background on an epoch now closing in the annals of the Oregon country.

There being no objection, the editorials and news stories were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEATH OF AN INDIAN CHIEF

Tommy Thompson filled the role of Indian chief, an authentic one too, for many decades, but at last, at age 104, he was called to the "happy fishing grounds" where fat salmon fresh from the sea are not cut off by white men's nets or dams—or laws. Chief Tommy was head of the small band of Wy'am Indians who clustered at Celilo Falls on the Columbia, falls now smothered by the impounded waters of the Columbia.

Chief Tommy was born on the banks of the great river of the West and died at nearby Hood River. He will be buried in the Indian cemetery on the bluffs overlooking the river where, in his lifetime, he saw railroads come, and highways with fast automobiles, saw giant man-guided birds fly in the airway of the Gorge and stubby tugs dragging barges replace the steamers Bailey Gatzert and T. J. Potter. He saw, in short, the passing of the pioneer stage of the white race in the Northwest and the ushering in of the industrial age, saw the accomodation of the Indians, painful and slow, to the white men's ways. In time his title of chief became honorary as the diminishing tribal authority passed to tribal councils; but he was venerated by the tribesmen for his title and his years and his loyalty to his band. They will accord him honors deriving from old custom in the funeral ceremonies attending his interment.

INDIAN DRUMS, VOICES PAY HOMAGE TO CHIEF TOMMY THOMPSON

(By Ann Sullivan)

Indians from many places in the Northwest, particularly Warm Springs and Yakima, have gathered at Celilo Falls to pay homage to beloved old Tommy Kuni Thompson, the last of the hereditary chiefs in Oregon. He died Sunday at Hood River.

The colorful centenarian, who was believed to be almost 105, was carried from the Anderson Mortuary in Hood River early Tuesday evening, dressed in pure white new buckskins, devoid of ornament.

He was taken in darkness past the gleaming, whirring massiveness of the Dalles Dam which he bitterly opposed and which in life he had declined to look at. His body, wrapped in some 10 fine Pendleton blankets was placed on top of his handsome, ornate beaded chieftain's trappings in a cedar coffin. They go with him to a world beyond with which he had long communicated through his holy bird, Pi-a-toot Ka-ke-a.

The bronze dove, a gift of the U.S. Army Engineers, is a replica of the little wooden bird which Tommy Kuni ("he who is full of knowledge") carved when he became chief of the Wy'ams about the time he was full grown. The bird customarily was mounted on his La-wit, or prayer pole in front of the long house of the old Celilo village. It always faced east—to the sun.

When the sun rose so that the shadow of the bird fell on the ground through the eastward opening of the long house, it was always time for the annual spring salmon festival, a time of rejoicing for the Indians, for the return of the bountiful food fish to spawn up the river.

It is almost that time now, but there has been no announcement of a festival, for gone are the ages-old fishing grounds.

Until midnight Tuesday, relatives and friends of the old chief gathered around his body in its casket in the new long house, thrumming drums and chanting Indian songs in his honor, recounting his bravery and wonderful things he was in life.

The large cedar casket was made by hand—as Chief Tommy had requested—by some of the Indians at Warm Springs. It was trucked to Celilo Tuesday, and the chief's body placed in it. The outside is varnished, and inside it is painted a sky blue—"when the dawn and the sun meet together."

The chief's widow, tiny Flora Thompson, who is about 60 years old (she married him about 10 years ago), helped dress him at the funeral home Tuesday.

She said that his fine, eagle feathered headdress will stay behind him, and that the only symbol of his chieftainship will be a single eagle feather in his hand.

The Indians at the funeral which is called "ni-cha-tut," had a snack supper at midnight and retired to rest until Wednesday morning, when they will again take up their homage.

This time the chanting and the drums will go on throughout the night, with the burial scheduled as near dawn as possible, as the chief had wished.

Mrs. Thompson said that it might not be until 8 or 9 a.m. because of difficulty of traversing the distance to the little old cemetery long used by the Celilos on the bluff overlooking the river. Railroad excavation long ago wiped out the road, so the National Guard has volunteered the use of heavy vehicles to traverse the neighboring farmer's land to reach the cemetery.

CHIEF TOMMY'S MEMORY A REPROACH

Chief Tommy Thompson of the Wy'am Indians was born in a tepee by the roaring waters of Celilo Falls.

For more than a century he lived within earshort of the sound. The roar has disappeared with the drowning of the Celilo rocks by the Dalles Dam pool. Now Chief Tommy has gone, at age 105, his last few years spent, sadly, in a nursing home.

His memory must always be a reproach to the white man. He saw the coming of the white settlers and the transition of a raw frontier into what we call civilization. He became a friend of the whites, but never did he accept their ways.

He resisted to the end the loss of the Celilo fishing rocks, which destroyed forever the colorful way of life of his people.

He did not consider money a substitute for salmon, and he refused personally to accept the pay offered each member of his tribe by the Federal Government for the loss of the fishing rights. Neither he nor anyone in his tribe participated in the agreement which signed away those rights, for his people's ancient claim was vague and hard to prove. "I have not signatured away my salmon," he was fond of saying.

Chief Tommy's body, wrapped in robes made especially for him and lying in a casket hewn from a single cedar log, will rest on the high shore of the Columbia near where he lived out his years.

The spot will be remembered not only by the people of his vanishing tribe but by many white persons who were his special friends and who vainly championed his cause.

Many other whites accept the inevitability of the great hydroelectric development at The Dalles but are a little uneasy in their consciences over the memory of what it did to Chief Tommy and his people.

They are not helped by the further knowledge that the overall record of the white men's dealings with the Indians over the decades is not one of which to be proud.

PLANS FOR INDIAN CHIEF TOMMY THOMPSON'S FUNERAL REVEALED; ANCIENT TRIBAL RIGHTS, SAD CHANTS DUE IN ALL-NIGHT WY'AM RITUAL

(By Bob C. Hall)

HOOD RIVER, April 14.—Chief Tommy Thompson, last of the great Columbia River chiefs, died Sunday night at his home near Celilo, the Indian fishing village on the Columbia where his tribe had lived for centuries. His family said he was close to 105 years of age.

The old chief of the Wy'am Indians (popularly called the Celilo Tribe after the steam boat Celilo that plied the river to that port of call) spanned a century of Oregon history. The ceremonials to be held over his body Tuesday and Wednesday nights will follow, to the letter, the rites which he himself had presided over, since the late 19th century.

Only a few whites will be among the Wy'am people to gather at "the long house" where Chief Thompson presided over the affairs of his people as they skewered and later netted the mighty salmon that traversed the Celilo cataracts.

Now the Dalles Dam has buried that world-famed tourist site, the railroads and highways have all but obliterated the historic Wy'am village there. But the long house still stands, and there the dead chief will receive the final tribute from his people.

Clad in white buckskin, the traditional attire for a dead chief on his way to the hereafter, with three eagle feathers in his hand, Chief Thompson is to lie in state today, while family and friends gather for the all-night ritual.

Then, circling the big cedar casket one by one, the tribe will chant their individual eulogies—a symbol of their friendship as they walk him to paradise. Each chanter steps out to let the next one step in after a brief "walk" so that only the dead chief travels all the way. The others move away lest they, too, be taken into the hereafter.

Wednesday night the tribe will carry their dead chief to the burial ground that lays on the windblown bluff high above the Celilo village. Ironically, they may have to ask a white man's permission to reach their cemetery. The old access road was ruined by white man's construction and the only route now passes through a farmer's private land.

Among the mourners will be the white woman who is closer to the tribe than any other nontribe member. She is Martha Ferguson McKeown, Willamette University graduate and teacher at Hood River's Wy'east High School. Mrs. McKeown and her late husband, Archie, spent several years before his death photographing and recording the peculiar life of the Celilo fishing Indians.

Out of that research has come two remarkable children's books, alternate pages of Mrs. McKeown's writings and Mr. McKeown's black and white photographs. The second of these, "Come to Our Salmon Feast," was released to the public by publishers Binfords & Mort, Portland, last week.

Mrs. McKeown, now an adopted daughter of Chief Thompson, and virtually his guardian in recent years, says the old chief was delighted with the new book, which she read to him last week. The book takes its title from a custom Chief Thompson had made a moral obligation, almost to his undoing.

Says Mrs. McKeown, "You see, when the original treaty, allowing the Wy'am to fish the Celilo Rapids, was signed by the participating tribes—Chief Thompson did not sign the agreement—he was told that the people were his responsibility and that he had to provide for them.

"So each year he held a giant feast just after the peak of the salmon fishing season. Then, with he and his family occupying the choicest fishing rock at Celilo, the fish were easy to come by and the feast was always a great event of the year.

"But lately, with the rapids gone—under the Dalles Dam Reservoir—it had practically ruined him to provide all that fish—yet he kept at it, insisting that this was his obligation."

Such an adherence to tradition was the dominating feature of Chief Thompson's life—a life which saw the final days of Indian glory in Oregon and ended in virtual slavery to the conquering whites.

A young boy when the first Indian treaties were signed, Chief Thompson grew up among a tribe that never fought the white man, served as scouts for the soldiers quartered at Fort Dalles.

His uncle, Chief Stoecketti, was killed on a scouting mission. Young Kuni took over the chief's role, then, later changed his name to Tommy Thompson after the explorer David Thompson. In his way he showed his intent to live peaceably beside the ancient fishing grounds, among the new white settlers.

But Indian treaties were, it seemed to the chief, made to be broken. The first Indian treaty of 1855 drew out the boundaries of Indian fishing rights. Another treaty in 1865 limited them still, and taught the Wy'am's a lesson in white diplomacy. As payment for the rights, the Government sent a trader named Huntington to pay off the Indians in blankets.

Huntington promptly cut the blankets in four pieces, gave a "blanket" to each family and made off with the remainder of the material.

In discussion with the Army Engineers over use of the Celilo area for the burgeoning plans of river development and dam construction, Chief Thompson was passively exasperating.

Says his biographer, Mrs. McKeown:

"You see, Chief Tommy believed the fish and the river came from his gods, and were never to be discussed in any way other than that he learned from his elders. So he would speak of them only in Wy'am language.

"Well, the engineers usually had no interpreter who could handle the language well and the discussions usually broke down with the engineers representatives exasperated with the chief and the chief usually indifferent to the whole thing."

But the ways of the whites, says Mrs. McKeown, were too devious for Chief Thompson. Agreements with other tribes who claimed a share of the Celilo fishery were produced as evidence of the Indians' willingness to give up their rights there. Claims Mrs. McKeown, the Wy'ams never signed a paper that they believed would deprive them of their fishery. She also notes that Government payments were made to the Nez Perce Indians for the Celilo fishery, despite the fact that the Nez Perce were never known to have fished there.

Finally, his people under Government supervision, and himself an old relic of a bygone era, Chief Thompson kept his tribal ways only to himself. In 1955, with proper facilities for his care lacking at Celilo, the tribe appealed to Mrs. McKeown for help. She secured lodging for him at Hanby's rest home in Hood River, where he spent the last 3 years of his life.

True to his heritage he requested—and got—a room with two windows facing east so that he could pray to his gods in the morning sky.

Sunday night the old half-blind chief died. He had seen the white man come, had watched a century of white man's progress in the Columbia Gorge. Sam Hill, the famed railroader, had brought royalty to visit the proud leader of the Wy'ams.

Monday night, they wrapped him in a new blanket, carried him to a Hood River funeral home. From the Warm Springs Indian Reservation came the great cedar casket that has waited for the chief. His wife, Flora Cushinway Thompson, his daughter, Ida Winookie, his son and probable heir to the chiefhood, Henry Thompson, will take him to his beloved long house today.

Tonight, the ancient Wy'am chant will rumble from the throats of his tribe, float out over the gorge hillside to the silent lake where, preceding Chief Thompson, the Celilo rapids were buried 2 years ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. McGEE in the chair]. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is concluded.

ORDER FOR MEETING AT 11 O'CLOCK TOMORROW MORNING

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business today it stand in adjournment until 11 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM FOR DEBATE ON LABOR BILL—NOTICE THAT SENATE WILL CONVENE AT 10:30 A.M. ON WEDNESDAY

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I announce that we shall have at least an hour and a half of discussion on the Ervin amendment tomorrow before we vote on it. I make the announcement so that Senators may make their plans accordingly. After the Senate meets at 11 o'clock tomorrow morning, we shall have the usual morning hour, to be followed by a quorum call. We shall then have at least an hour and a half of discussion on the Ervin amendment and, following a quorum call, we shall proceed to vote on the amendment.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I have discussed with the distinguished ranking minority member of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER] and the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, the author of the bill, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], the question of procedure during the consideration of the bill and the matter of convenience in connection with arranging the sessions of the Senate.

We plan to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow. After the usual morning hour we shall have at least an hour and a half of discussion on the Ervin amendment. Then we will vote on the Ervin amendment. We may have other votes tomorrow afternoon. We cannot be sure, however.

We hope to be able to meet on Wednesday at 10:30 a.m., and stay in session rather late, perhaps until 7:30 that evening. It may be that we shall be able to dispose of the bill without having night sessions, but we shall not be able to be sure about that until we get further along with the discussion of the bill. At least we plan to remain in session from 10:30 in the morning to 7:30 in the evening, until we can determine what progress we are making. If it is necessary to have longer sessions to dispose of the bill this week, we can announce them later in the week.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1555) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN] to strike out title VI. The Chair calls attention to the fact that the unanimous consent agreement to limit the time of debate on the amendment becomes effective at this time.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield 15 minutes to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I rise in support of S. 1555, the Labor-Management Reporting and Disclosure Act of 1959.

In preface to my comments I wish to make clear that I harbor bias neither for labor nor management. I refuse alike to be stampeded by proponents of punitive legislation or to be lulled into complacency by advocates of the status quo.

The public interest will not best be served by our submitting here to those who would seek to weaken, cripple, or destroy a free trade union movement. Nor will the public welfare be advanced by our catering to those who would wink at labor abuses and thereby permit the vast majority of honest labor to be brought under a cloud of suspicion and the rightful prerogatives of honest management to be endangered or submerged.

We are confronted at this time with the duty of legislating on certain aspects of one of the main institutions of modern America. Like other American institutions, the trade union movement has grown well beyond the assumptions of its early intimate and fraternal organization. Like other organizations in business, industry, and government also, some unions have become large, impersonal, and bureaucratic systems in which the interests of the individual members have ofttimes become lost, and the members themselves have occasionally become apathetic in fulfilling their responsibilities toward union control.

Within the power vacuum that has thus developed, there have arisen—as the investigations of the McClellan committee have so pointedly revealed—men in both labor and management who have exploited the situation to their own selfish and sometimes corrupt interests.

This has resulted in what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], the chief sponsor of the bill, has delineated as abuses of power on the part of both labor and management to the detriment of the welfare of employees, employers, and the public.

The purpose of the measure is, therefore, to correct the conditions which have led to such abuses, and further, in the words of Mr. George Meany, president of the AFL–CIO, to "aid the American trade union movement to maintain free, democratic, and responsible trade unions, cleansed of the crooks and racketeers who have preyed upon some unions and upon segments of some of the unions."

It is my earnest conviction, Mr. President—and I speak as a cosponsor of the bill and as a member of both the Subcommittee on Labor which conducted the hearings and the parent Committee on Labor and Public Welfare—that S. 1555 represents a forthright and well-considered advance in the directions indicated by the able junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] and by Mr. Meany.

This effort is not designed, as some would have it, to legislate in the broad field of labor-management relations. That task is for another time and another bill. The floor of the Senate is not the most appropriate place to introduce too many amendments which may succeed only in defeating the equally urgent but more limited aims of the pending bill.

In this respect, I wish to refer to comments from a recent statement by Prof. Archibald Cox, of Harvard Law School. Professor Cox, a specialist in the field of labor-management law, was chairman of the group of experts who worked with the committee staff in drafting the original Kennedy-Ives bill, and he is a member of the group currently studying the entire Taft-Hartley Act. He, therefore, speaks with some considerable authority in this field.

In the opinion of Professor Cox—and in the opinions of the majority of the members of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare—the issues of internal union reform and labor-management relations are different issues which should be dealt with separately. To quote Professor Cox:

> The two subjects ought to be handled separately * * * for a number of reasons. In the first place, the two subject matters are analytically distinct. Union reform has to do with the relationship between the organization or the officialdom and the members. Labor-management relations, of course, has to do with union organization, how collective bargaining works, and ultimately, with the balance of power between management and labor. And to mix the two, I submit, simply causes confusion.
> Second, the need for internal reforms should not be made the occasion for enacting repressive measures. We cannot protect union members against financial dishonesty or guarantee internal democracy by weakening the bargaining power of the unions. In presenting reform measures, one of the very important things psychologically—one of the important things in terms of the way employees will react to it—is to make plain that legislation directed at reform is not concerned with weakening the union.

I point out in this respect, Mr. President, the inconsistency of those who seek to remove title VI from the bill as being irrelevant, and yet insist on amending S. 1555 to include provisions against organizational picketing and secondary boycotting.

Not only were the provisions of title VI also in the Kennedy-Ives legislation which passed this body last year by a vote of 88 to 1, but none of the provisions in this section of the bill touches upon the basic power relationships of labor and management. In addition, each of the proposals of title VI has been thoroughly deliberated upon and examined in committee hearings and consequently has been narrowed in its meaning and implications.

While many citizens advocate the need for legislation regarding organizational picketing and the use of the secondary boycott, there remains a wide diversity of opinion on these subjects. In addition, legislation on both issues deals with the fundamental balance of power between labor and management and should properly be advanced only after adequate hearings and preparation. The Republic will not be endangered, Mr. President, if the Senate delays passage on these matters until it is more fully informed.

Leaving aside, therefore, the broad issues of labor-management relations, and turning to the problems of internal union reforms, Senate bill 1555 is a realistic and carefully studied legislative proposal.

It is a proper bill because it is directed toward implementing the four remaining legislative recommendations of the first interim report of the McClellan committee: First, to regulate and control union funds; second, to insure union democracy; third, to curb employer uses of middlemen in labor-management disputes; fourth, to eliminate the ambiguity of the no man's land between State and Federal authority. The junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] noted on the floor of this body last Wednesday, April 15, 45 specific provisions of the bill which would implement the recommendations of the McClellan committee.

Mr. President, at this point I turn aside to say that constantly we hear that the recommendations from within the McClellan committee, the findings of that group, and the work it has done are not reflected in Senate bill 1555. Mr. President, I repeat that 45 specific provisions of Senate bill 1555 would implement the recommendations which have come to us from the McClellan committee.

Furthermore—and I believe this fact needs to be emphasized, in the light of some of the proposals which have been offered and which will be suggested—the pending measure remains true to the traditional Anglo-Saxon and American concept of justice, in that it places criminal sanctions and penalties where they belong—namely, upon the individual wrongdoer among labor and management officials, rather than upon the rank and file of union or labor movement members.

The Senate is no forum in which to traffic with the mystic concept of collective guilt which would penalize the entire union membership for the wrongdoing of one or a few of its officials. To depart from the ancient principle of justice of individual responsibility and individual guilt is to contravene one of the basic assumptions of a democratic philosophy.

Mr. President, on April 7 there was held, in Parkersburg, W. Va., an election for the mayor of that city. There were 25,546 men and women eligible to vote; they were registered as eligible to ballot in that specific election. Of that total, 10,344 actually cast their ballots. In other words, 60 out of every 100 eligible voters in that election failed to use that franchise of freedom, which was not only an opportunity, but also was a responsibility under our system of government. I say to them—because I believe this is perhaps an appropriate place to say it—that we can drift or, in fact, we can dive into a dictatorship in this country. We can lose democracy by default. I believe we forfeit our freedoms when we, as American citizens, fail to exercise the responsibility of the American ballot.

I tell this story for a very definite reason—namely, because today we are faced, perhaps more than ever before, with a desire on the part of some of us to continue the dignity of the individual. On the other hand, we have bigness all about us—bigness in government, bigness in industry, bigness in labor. Bigness is a part of our American life. Yet I wish to see to it that the individual is not lost in the shuffle.

So, Mr. President, I think it important to note that, in preparing this proposed legislation, we have maintained the ancient principle of justice, of individual responsibility and individual guilt; and this is one of the assumptions of our philosophy in which most Americans believe.

This is also a well-considered bill, Mr. President—indeed, one of the most thoroughly considered in which it has been my privilege to participate. As has been observed before, the 1958 version was passed here by a vote of 88 to 1; it was then further improved by redrafting, before being introduced in the present session. And after another series of exhaustive hearings—bringing the total testimony on the measure to more than 2,300 pages—it was further perfected by the Senate Labor Committee with 46 amendments, and was reported by a vote of 13 to 2, in which process it acquired additional cosponsorship of a bipartisan nature from the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] and the senior

Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS]. Their own supplemental views are worth quoting at this point, for I believe they concisely express the basic achievements of the bill in its improved version:

It establishes as law the principles of democracy in unions; it adapts to their internal administration the standard of honesty and fair play which are basic to our society; and it provides for conditions which should make for integrity in the relations between unions and representatives of management.

The bill is, of course, not entirely satisfactory to everyone, and is perhaps not even perfectly satisfactory to any member of the committee. We believe, however, that it is a wholesome and substantial contribution to the law at this time which is practical and represents material progress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCGEE in the chair). The time yielded to the Senator from West Virginia has expired.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I should like to be allowed an additional 5 minutes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I yield an additional 5 minutes to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I thank the Senator from Montana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia is recognized for an additional 5 minutes.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I devoutly hope that our action will not be restricted due to differences; that we shall ask questions, not in terms of whether a particular policy will circumscribe the power of labor, but, rather, whether it is in the best national interests, as well as in labor's legitimate self-interests.

This is only an instance, however, of the need to avoid the general tendency of interpreting public problems in terms of opposite solutions. Our political discourse and, hence, the solutions to political questions are too often restricted by the use of polar or opposite terms—liberal and conservative, radical and reactionary, labor and management, farmer and consumer, socialist and capitalist, and so forth. The list could be extended. And all of us are familiar with the old platitude, "There are two sides to every question."

Such a polarizing of public problems, however, falsifies the realities of our national life. There are, in fact, as many sides to every question as there are parties or interests involved. And the great genius of the democratic process is that it offers a wider variety of solutions than can be encompassed by mere opposites.

Politics in a democracy is the art of the possible—the art of compromise and conciliation. Webster defines "compromise" as "a settlement by arbitration or by consent reached by mutual concessions." This definition offers us a clue as to how all of us can make worthwhile contributions in the arena of public affairs. Labor-management relations, no less than the life of business and commerce, is in large measure a matter of offering mutual concessions, of arriving at a compromise of interests whereby each party gains some needed satisfaction.

Finally, Mr. President, the main provisions of the pending proposal have the endorsement of an overwhelming number of responsible labor leaders throughout the country, most of whom are equally as concerned and anxious as are we to rid the union movement of the influence of racketeers within its ranks. Representative of the views of such leaders is the statement of Mr. George M. Harrison, grand president of the Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks, Freight Handlers, Express, and Station Employees, who stated in testimony his belief that:

It is entirely possible to have a strong and effective labor-management reform bill which will forcibly attack such corruption and racketeering as have infiltrated the labor movement, without at the same time sacrificing existing union customs, traditions, and constitutional provisions which have long been recognized as honest, ethical, and democratic and completely compatible with the standard of conduct implicit in this legislation.

In closing, Mr. President, I reiterate that S. 1555 is the product of lengthy and judicious deliberations. The Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee heard testimony from the leaders of both interested parties—labor and management—and from disinterested experts identified neither with labor nor management. Many proposals were heard and considered by the members of the committee, and the bill in its present form is the product of the combined judgment of the committee on a vote of 13 to 2. It is my hope, therefore, that the Senate will pass S. 1555 substantially in its present form, and not be led into vain and futile efforts to realine the entire balance of power of labor and management at this time.

We owe it to the overwhelming mass of honest men and women of American labor to assist them in achieving the same basic principles in the union movement that we adhere to in the larger national community as a whole. We owe no less to the American public. This, I believe, S. 1555 will help bring about, and for this reason it has my support.

I remember when, in the 1920's in West Virginia, we had armed guards in the mining camps who worked against giving men the opportunity for collective bargaining, and even to achieve the standards of fair practice within unions. I recall that in the coal fields of West Virginia loyal labor was crucified on the cross of long hours and short pay and inadequate health conditions under which men would toil.

Those conditions were apparent to men and women who studied such circumstances in West Virginia. I remember the advances which have been wrought. I remember the programs which have been placed in State and Federal law, which have changed to a very considerable degree—to an almost entire degree—the situations of which I have spoken. I believed it was necessary for labor organizations to be treated fairly, and I believe labor must continue to be given its rightful recognition. In 1959 the Senate has, in its individual and collective membership, the responsibility of correcting, insofar as possible, the defects within the labor leadership which have arisen.

We can do that, Mr. President, without punitive action, without destroying the strength of individual members within a union, or the union movement itself.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR MOSS BEFORE NATIONAL CIVIL LIBERTIES CLEARING HOUSE

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I yield myself half a minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENNEDY in the chair). The Senator from Montana is recognized for half a minute.

Mr. MANSFIELD. On April 17, 1959, at a luncheon meeting at the Sheraton-Carlton Hotel in Washington, D.C., the distinguished junior Senator from Utah [Mr. Moss] delivered an address before the National Civil Liberties Clearing House. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the address delivered by the Senator from Utah.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without obection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I would call to the attention of the Senate the fact that the Senator from Utah, like the distinguished majority leader, the Senator from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], indicates that what he wants in the field of civil rights is the attainable, and not the unattainable. I quote from a portion of his speech, as follows:

The question to be decided this year then, is this: In the light of current conditions, what should be our program? Shall we vote for and attempt to pass and be counted in favor of, legislation that we know will not pass? Or shall we attempt a program that will do some things that very much need doing, and that we can, in all probability, get done?

I hope that all of us in the Senate, regardless of our position on the question of civil rights, will read what the distinguished Senator from Utah pointed out, because it is worthwhile.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS OF SENATOR FRANK E. MOSS, DEMOCRAT, OF UTAH, BEFORE THE 11TH ANNUAL CONFERENCE, NATIONAL CIVIL LIBERTIES CLEARING HOUSE, APRIL 17, 1959, HOTEL SHERATON-CARLTON, WASHINGTON, D.C.

I deem it a compliment, I am sure, to be invited to discuss "Congress and Civil Rights" before a group as representative and as well informed as you who are participating in this conference of the National Civil Liberties Clearing House.

Of the attributes which give meaning to the term "American" none are more important than those which allow every citizen the same treatment before the law, and the same opportunities for advancement, culture and recognition, as those allowed any other.

This is the reason that I found it such a thrill to vote for the admission of Hawaii as our 50th State. For Hawaii today—more than any other section of our country—represents this American ideal of a commonwealth built by citizens who may differ in almost every possible way but who are bound together by a common regard for political liberty.

As a newcomer to Congress, and representing a State which, in its modern history, has not had civil rights as a major issue, one fact about "Congress and Civil Rights" seems more significant to me than any other. (I say "modern history" because Utahans once had the problem in its most acute form. The territory was settled by those who were driven from their homes because of religious beliefs, and there was a time, before statehood, when the right of the majority to control elections was circumvented by a Washington-appointed judiciary.)

But that was long ago, and today the most significant fact to me about Congress and civil rights is that the Civil Rights Act of 1957 is the first legislation on this subject to pass the U.S. Senate since Reconstruction.

The House of Representatives has passed numerous measures, of course, on lynching, poll taxes, and other subjects, and the Senate has conducted some historic debates on them. But the sectional makeup of the Senate has always asserted itself to bar legislation that seriously challenged the prerogatives of officials of the several States.

Many felt that this Congress would be different. Perhaps it was optimism generated by the defeat of many members of the so-called Old Guard. Perhaps it was misreading the results; perhaps just wishful thinking—but it was widely believed that the feeling for civil rights legislation was now so strong that the liberals of both parties would challenge the leadership of the Senate on this issue. It was even predicted that that ancient ornament of the Senate—the filibuster—would be cast aside to make way for the new era.

The vote this year on rule 22 quickly dispelled that illusion. Looking at history, it must be apparent that whatever is done by Congress on civil rights depends on what is satisfactory to the Senate. Therefore, my very short and incomplete analysis of the proposals before Congress will be limited to what is before the Senate.

On the basis of the persons or groups sponsoring them, there are four general types of bills: First, the administration bills, one introduced by Senator GOLDWATER, the rest by Senator DIRKSEN, the minority leader; second, the Johnson bills, introduced by the majority leader; third, the Douglas bills, introduced by Senator DOUGLAS, the Democrat who was a leader in the fight on rule 22; and fourth, what I will call the Javits-Keating bills, introduced by the New York Republicans.

As you know, many of these bills contain provisions, or parts of provisions, or ideas, from other bills and groups of bills.

As far as content goes, which I think is the most useful division for our purpose today, let's divide the proposals in two groups, putting in the first group those which seem to have the support of all shades of opinion.

This first group has three main points. The first is the extension of the term, or of the time to report, of the present Civil Rights Commission. Second are various provisions to strengthen the laws against terrorism, intimidation and destruction of property.

One of the Dirksen bills, for example, punishes interstate flight to avoid prosecution for destruction of educational and religious structures. A very similar provision is in one of Senator KEATING'S bills. Title IV of Senator JOHNSON'S bill makes it a crime to transport or possess explosives for the purpose of intimidation or wrongful destruction, and permits the FBI to investigate, and to cooperate with State authorities, in cases of destruction of buildings by explosives.

The third idea is to strengthen the Attorney General's hand in compelling preservation and disclosure of voting records.

This first group of bills, then, contains three ideas that are rather generally agreed upon, and can most likely be passed. To repeat, they are (1) extending the life of the Civil Rights Commission; (2) strengthening the laws against terrorism; and (3) preserving and disclosing Federal election records.

The second group of bills includes provisions which have historically failed to pass; which would make the Justice Department, one way or another, responsible for deciding whether local officials are violating the 14th amendment, and would obligate the Attorney General to take action to compel compliance.

Senator DOUGLAS, for example, would authorize the Secretary of HEW to approve, and if necessary, prepare plans to carry out desegregation, and would require the Attorney General to enforce the plans if local official did not.

Senator JAVITS would authorize the Attorney General to institute civil injunctive proceedings against local officials who deprive citizens of their rights under the 14th amendment.

And there are many other proposals in this second group. But they all have one thing in common—they would make it the obligation of the Federal Government to take over if the States, in the opinion of Federal officials, failed to guarantee to citizens their rights.

And this, of course, is the point where the Senate has historically refused to move. It was just this provision—to allow the Attorney General to institute civil suits—that was taken out of the Civil Rights Act of 1957.

The question to be decided this year then, is this: In the light of current conditions, what should be our program? Should we vote for and attempt to pass and be counted in favor of, legislation that we know will not pass? Or shall we attempt a program that will do some things that very much need doing, and that we can, in all probability, get done?

Our ultimate purpose always must be to end discrimination as rapidly as possible. And the long history of the civil rights struggle has shown the futility of the belief that education alone can or will accomplish our purpose. Important as education is, it must be bolstered by firm legal action.

Our immediate purpose then should be to develop that program that will move us furthest along the road in the immediate future.

It would be a tragic mistake, in my opinion, to discuss any congressional program for civil rights other than in the light of the great school desegregation program now being carried out. The collapse of massive resistance in Virginia, and the subsequent more realistic efforts of Governor Almond and the legislature to meet the problems of that collapse, signals the beginning of the end of legal segregation, although we must realize that unofficial segregation, through private schools may continue for some time. Surely this is a great victory in our struggle.

And any action Congress takes must—it seems to me—help, not hinder, this desegregation process. The Civil Rights Commission should finish its job, and give to the Congress and the country the benefit of its findings.

Those officials who are fighting terrorism, and those individuals who must face terrorism to stand for their rights, are entitled to the strongest measures we can pass to help them.

Standing up to be counted has value. And the great congressional debates have served to dramatize the denials of civil rights and to arouse America's conscience.

But it may be that this year our attempt should be a unified one to consolidate our gains, to pass those items for which we have the votes, and to lay the groundwork for a further congressional assault on denials of rights through the 14th amendment. To move forward, even though slightly, advances the cause.

Such a period of consolidation must of course be temporary and of short duration.

And it should be fully utilized to advance the cause of civil rights everywhere on a local and State basis. The focus of national attention will be on the South, on the Negro, and on desegregation. But civil rights gains need to be made in every State in the Union and for every minority whose national origin makes it the victim of discrimination.

And every local improvement will be reflected in Congress, and particularly where it is needed most in Congress—the Senate. And every State advance will bring nearer the day when Congress will enact a complete civil rights law.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield to the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Politics has been defined as the art of the possible. One might, in the light of what has been stated, say it is also the art of the attainable. I think we can proceed as practical persons by subscribing to that thesis.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I am sure we can. Like the distinguished minority leader, I anticipate we will be able to come up with a satisfactory, reasonable civil rights bill at this session.

TRIBUTES TO SECRETARY OF STATE JOHN FOSTER DULLES

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield time to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. MANSFIELD. How much time does the Senator from Oregon desire?

Mr. NEUBERGER. About 30 seconds.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, determined dedication to the service of his country will always be recognized as the outstanding characteristic of John Foster Dulles. This untiring devotion to a lifetime cause undoubtedly was a major factor in his ultimate but difficult decision to retire as Secretary of State. His personality did not nurture a withdrawal from active participation in service to his Government. In John Foster Dulles, our Nation will always have an example of a man whose high sense of duty transcended his personal welfare. This viewpoint is reflected in newspaper editorials which appeared in the State of Oregon, in the Oregonian on April 16, and in the Coos Bay World on April 14. I ask unanimous consent to have these editorial tributes to John Foster Dulles printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the tributes were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Coos Bay (Oreg.) World, Apr. 14, 1959]

LIFETIME OF SERVICE IS SUM

State Secretary John Foster Dulles' resignation from the Cabinet is now a foregone conclusion by those who saw the indomitable but ailing man on his return to Washington for further checkups of his progress in his battle against cancer.

Whether or not Mr. Dulles has decided to resign is a moot point. The decision, an inexorable one, seems to have been made for him.

Thus an astonishing career of work and faith is at an end. It is one of those sad times, even for those who have been frequent critics of Secretary Dulles' actions and motivations.

Whether or not one has agreed with Mr. Dulles' results in his 6½ years as chief Cabinet officer for President Eisenhower, it is impossible to deny the glittering nature of the man's personality, the force with which he has advocated the U.S. case before the rest of the world and—going beyond his tenure as Secretary of State—the whole lifetime of service and good works which he has stored up for the credit side of his own life's final ledger.

The Secretary's faults, which are naturally overlooked at a time like this, probably resulted from the same singlemindedness which drove him onward to the pinnacle of his lifelong ambitions. It is so with all of us; faults and assets are hopelessly intermingled and it is sometimes impossible to tell them apart.

No one can assess a man's career from such a short distance in time. But it is likely that if John Foster Dulles' career is ever satisfactorily summed, the word "service" will be heavily emphasized. (F. W. A.)

[From the Oregonian, Portland, Oreg., Apr. 16, 1959]

HE STOOD FAST

The enforced retirement of John Foster Dulles from the office of Secretary of State must come as unwelcome news even to his detractors. For in a real sense he was the embodiment of U.S. foreign policy, a man triply armored against assaults from home and abroad by a vast experience, a flinty determination, and the unquestioned confidence of the President of the United States. His loss will be sorely felt in these next few months of negotiation on the German question.

Yet there could be no other decision. Mr. Dulles had failed to respond, as before, to treatment for cancer. He is no longer physically capable of filling a post which, by his interpretation, is one of the most rigorous in the Government.

It is said in Washington that he prevailed on the President to announce his retirement earlier than Mr. Eisenhower had intended, because Mr. Dulles was well aware that an unsympathetic interpretation might be put on his seeming to hold to his high post although incapacitated. His extreme devotion to and immersion in his work, which could have led to such a conception, have been both strength and weakness. He gave himself, body and mind, to the chief stewardship of U.S. foreign affairs. He gave the appearance of carrying his office with him and of remaining remote from his staff of experts in Washington, D.C., and the other capitals of the world.

His single-purposed intensity sometimes led to unhappy consequences. He was not, in his approach to his job, a profound man. He was a doer, with the creed that it was better to do or say anything at all than to do or say nothing.

Naturally, this led to much criticism, from Americans and from our allies—a good part of it merited. His phrase "massive retaliation" did not stand up under analysis. Nor did his published reference to risking war at the brink. But, on balance, the Dulles works are remarkably impressive. One thing rides above all: He stood fast. He did not bend to the political winds at home or rebukes from abroad. He was a persistent, positive force in a job where those qualities have often been lacking.

It is too early, of course, to say whether the Dulles steel has solved any of our major problems. But it is something to say that he took his stand and held it—and the failure to do just that has been in his lifetime the West's greatest failure in world affairs. Whatever the eventual settlement on Quemoy, the United States stood firm and thereby (by the testimony here last week of Rear Adm. Samuel Eliot Morison) has won new respect throughout Asia. Whatever future events may be in the Middle East, in Germany or elsewhere over the globe, Mr. Dulles can be proud of the decisive role he played in these areas.

Now there will be a new Secretary of State—and the sooner the better. Whoever he may be, he will have at least one advantage in a very difficult situation: He will have the vigorous and living example of a truly dedicated predecessor.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1555) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes.

Mr. ERVIN rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina seek recognition? Does the Senator from Montana yield time to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I wish to have the floor in my own right.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield so that I may suggest the absence of a quorum, without his losing the floor or any time being taken out of the time allocated?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield with that understanding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I yield myself 30 minutes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. ERVIN. I am delighted to yield to the distinguished Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I send to the desk three amendments to the pending bill, S. 1555, and ask that they be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, before I address myself to the pending amendment, I send forward two amendments to other portions of the bill and ask that they be printed at this point in the RECORD, and also that they be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The first amendment submitted by Mr. ERVIN was to delete section 112.

The second amendment was to amend section 601 by adding at the end thereof an additional subsection (C) reading as follows:

Neither this section nor any other provision of this act or the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 shall operate to deprive any employee, employer, labor organization, or other person of any right or remedy under any State law in any case not covered by the provisions of this act or the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, as one who has had the privilege of serving on the so-called Senate Rackets Committee for more than 2 years, I feel that there is a crying need for immediate remedial legislation in the field of the relation between unions and union officers on the one hand, and rank-and-file union members on the other.

In common with other members of the Senate Rackets Committee, other Members of Congress, and the public generally, I have been astounded by the virtually unbelievable conditions which the investigations of this committee have revealed with respect to certain unions. I believe that such conditions are exceptional, but I am also convinced from the 17,000 or 18,000 pages of testimony taken before the Senate Rackets Committee that the conditions are sufficiently widespread as to demand the enactment by the Congress of legislation which will put an end to malpractices in the internal affairs of labor unions.

I was much impressed by the wisdom of the statement made by Prof. Archibald Cox, of the Harvard Law School, a specialist in the field of labor law, when the Kennedy-Ives bill was in process of formation during the previous session of Congress. Professor Cox pointed out:

The central problems of labor policy today concern the relationship between union officials and rank-and-file members. They cover five areas: (1) The handling of union finances; (2) conflicts of interest; i.e., the use of union office for personal profit; (3) the use of international trusteeships to take over the affairs of a local union; (4) union elections; and (5) protection of the worker's interest in union membership. In my opinion, the committee would do well to concentrate on these five areas without opening up a host of controversial amendments to the National Labor Relations Act.

That was the statement of Professor Cox before the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare when that committee was in process of drafting the Kennedy-Ives bill.

My amendment, which is now pending before the Senate, is designed to do exactly what Professor Cox said the Congress should do in this field. I maintain that the wisest course of action which could possibly be followed by the Congress in connection with the pending legislation would be, first, to adopt my amendment to strike from the bill title VI; second, thereafter to refuse to write into the bill any amendments dealing with the area covered by the Taft-Hartley Act.

As the able and distinguished Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] stated a moment ago, two fields are involved. One is the field of labor reform, which is concerned with malpractices in the field of internal affairs of unions. That field is adequately dealt with in the first five titles of Senate bill 1555.

The other field, which is now covered by the Taft-Hartley Act, is the field of the external relations of industry on the one hand and the unions on the other. The two fields are distinct from each other. They demand different legislative treatment; and in my judgment it would be unwise to attempt to combine in a single bill provisions dealing with both these fields.

I was very much interested in the Kennedy-Ives bill at the previous session of Congress. I made the point then which I am trying to make now, that we should remove from the bill all provisions dealing with nongermane amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act, and leave them for later consideration in a separate bill.

The investigations conducted by the McClellan committee show the absolute need for legislation to protect a group of American citizens who now have no protection whatever. I refer to the rank-and-file union members who have the misfortune to hold membership in unions which are controlled by dictatorial union officers, in some instances, and by corrupt union officers in other instances. They have no protection under Federal law, and in many cases they have no protection under State law, because local officials in some places do not seem to be concerned about the wrongs inflicted upon these unfortunate union members.

The investigations of the McClellan committee also show the need for some legislation in the field now covered by the Taft-Hartley Act. I favor legislation in the instances disclosed by the investigations of the McClellan committee, where it appears that there is a need for legislation in the field of the Taft-Hartley Act.

We have found that some unions have virtually ceased making bona fide efforts to persuade those who labor to join them. Instead of seeking by persuasion to induce workers to believe that their interests lie in joining them, these particular unions throw picket lines around plants and, in many cases, even hire persons who are not union members to walk in the picket lines. Their object is to force the managements of the plants being picketed to coerce their employees to join such unions, regardless of the wishes of such employees. According to my way of thinking, that is an interference with and a denial of the basic rights of those who work in the plants which are picketed. The investigations of the McClellan committee show a crying need for regulation of this organizational picketing.

The investigations also show that in some instances the secondary boycott device has been abused with the result of absolutely wrecking and destroying the business of innocent persons who were not parties to the labor dispute and had no connection whatever with it. They have had their businesses destroyed, not because the unions had any complaint against them, but only because the unions wanted to practice indirect economic coercion upon certain other employers.

Therefore, I say there is need for a clarification of the law affecting secondary boycotts; indeed, there is a crying need for such legislation. It is almost as great as the crying need for legislation in the field of labor reform.

There is a difference, however, which prompts me to put the case of labor reform ahead of necessary changes in the field of the Taft-Hartley Act. The difference is that under the Taft-Hartley Act as it now exists unions have substantial protection against abuses on the part of management, and management has substantial protection against abuses on the part of unions. But rank-and-file-union members, who have the misfortune to belong to unions controlled by officers who are dictatorial or corrupt, have no protection whatever.

When the Kennedy-Ives bill was pending before the Senate last year, I made this statement:

> I should like to confine the bill to the first five titles, which provide remedies to prevent abuses toward the rank and file of labor members in their democratic rights as members of local unions, those abuses which result in the misuse of union funds, and those abuses illustrated by the sweetheart contracts between union leaders and management. Therefore, I would vote for an amendment to strike out title 6 entirely and to restrict the bill solely to those matters investigated by the McClellan committee. That action would result in a bill for which every man who believes in honesty and square dealing * * * could vote without misgivings.

I am satisfied that if the course which I then advocated had been pursued, we would have had on the statute books of the Nation for many months now gone the salient features of the first five titles of the Kennedy-Ives bill, which are in large part similar to the first five titles of Senate bill 1555.

When the Kennedy-Ives bill was before the Senate at the last session, I made this statement:

> I used to read Aesop's Fables. In Aesop's Fables there is a story about a dog which started across a foot log with a bone in its mouth. The dog saw his reflection and the reflection of the bone he was carrying in the creek. Being anxious to get the bone he thought he saw in the creek, he opened his mouth to grab that bone, and lost the bone he had. That is precisely what is going to happen with respect to this bill if we load the bill down with a lot of amendments which are not germane to the restricted field covered by the first five titles.

Mr. President, I believe that we are in danger of doing exactly the same thing in respect to the pending bill by retaining in the bill title VI and section 112 of title I which undertakes to change the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act relating to the anti-Communist oath.

When the Kennedy-Ives bill was before the Senate last year I also said:

> Mr. President, the lot of a legislator is not always a happy one. Many times he is compelled to vote against proposed legislation which he favors. Insofar as I am concerned, that is true in respect to the amendment submitted by the able and distinguished senior Senator from Florida. I am strongly in favor of the enactment of a law which will carry out the objective of his amendment. But * * * Mr. President, if the bill * * * is used by us as a vehicle for a consideration of all the changes which Senators think should be made in the Taft-Hartley Act, we would make it certain, insofar as this session of Congress is concerned, that the labors of the McClellan select committee have been in vain. Undoubtedly there are many areas in which the Taft-Hartley Act should be amended; and it should be amended in the area to which the amendment of the able and distinguished senior Senator from Florida applies. * * * It is better to do one job at a time. It is much better for the Senate to pass a law which the overwhelming majority of the Members of Congress * * * will support, than it is to propose to that law amendments which will make it virtually certain that no legislation in this field will be enacted at this session.

On another occasion when amendments designed to eliminate the so-called no man's land in the field of labor law were being discussed, I again pleaded with the Senate in this way:

> Let us do one job at a time.

Again, on another occasion when the Senate was considering amendments relating to secondary boycotts, I said:

> I wish to reiterate that if we use the pending bill as a vehicle for either weakening or strengthening the provisions of the Taft-Hartley law, we shall insure that there will be no labor legislation in this session of Congress.

We are likewise confronted at this time by two alternatives. The first is to strip from the bill amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act not germane to the primary object of the bill, which is to prevent improper practices in the internal affairs of unions. That is one alternative. If we should take that course, which is the object of the pending amendment, then the Senate would pass the bill with a minimum of debate and delay, and in all probability the House would do the same. We could then turn our attention in an adequate fashion to the consideration of the whole Taft-Hartley law.

But if we allow any nongermane Taft-Hartley provisions to remain in the bill we invite every Senator who has any idea of how the Taft-Hartley Act should be amended to offer his amendments. Indeed, we invite all the people of America, all the business interests of the country, and everybody else concerned, to insist on the inclusion of Taft-Hartley amendments in the bill.

If we leave the bill open for the rewriting of the Taft-Hartley Act on the floor of the Senate we are likely to end either with no legislation whatever to protect the rank-and-file members of certain unions who have had their rights so much abused by the men who were supposed to look after their interests, or we will mangle the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes to engage in a discussion with the Senator from North Carolina.

First, I appreciate the position which the Senator has taken. He is a cosponsor of the bill and has been a member of the McClellan committee since its inception. He is vitally interested in the reform sections of the so-called Kennedy-Ervin bill. I know that his interest in seeking to strike out title VI is based only on the fact that he feels its presence in the bill imperils the bill's passage by both the Senate and the House and its signature by the President.

My reasons for opposing the amendment are somewhat similar to the reasons for which the Senator from North Carolina proposes the amendment. I stated about a month ago that I would join with the Senator from North Carolina in seeking to strike out title VI if I believed that its presence in the bill imperiled the chances for the passage of the bill. As of today—my view may change as the debate proceeds—I do not think its presence imperils the passage of the bill. In fact, I have some reason to believe that its presence will help the bill to sail through both the Senate and the House and toward signature by the President.

In title VI there are six amendments to the Taft-Hartley law. The first is the no man's land amendment, one of the five original recommendations of the McClellan committee. I think it was first included at the instance of former Senator Ives, who was quite concerned about the problem. It was one of the five basic recommendations of the committee in its first annual report. So this part of title VI is quite germane. Even though we may not have arrived at a happy solution to the problem, nevertheless the problem deserves consideration in the bill because of the position which the McClellan committee took.

As to the problem of construction trades, the Senator from North Carolina is aware of the fact that when a labor bill was introduced in March of last year, it contained no section dealing with any amendments to the Taft-Hartley law; the bill was confined to the recommendations of the McClellan committee.

When the debate on the pension and welfare bill took place in the Senate in April, two amendments were offered to that bill. One, which was offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], contained a provision dealing with economic strikers, which is now in title VI. The other amendment dealt with the building trades. It was offered by former Senator Smith of New Jersey, who was the ranking Republican member of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

When an arrangement was made whereby in return for defeating those amendments as a part of the pension and welfare bill, we would commit ourselves to reporting a bill to the Senate by June 15, Senator Smith of New Jersey rose to ask if we would consider as a part of the agreement the administration's recommendations regarding the Taft-Hartley amendments. In order to prevent the pension bill from being loaded down with completely ungermane amendments, I made a commitment that we would consider those amendments as well as the actual reform provisions.

So the genesis of those provisions is in the administration's recommendations and in the commitment I made on the floor of the Senate to former Senator Smith of New Jersey.

We did consider those recommendations along with the reform measures. They were acted on favorably by the committee and were reported to the Senate. They were submitted to yea and nay votes, and all of them were agreed to by the Senate, in some cases by a unanimous vote, and in other cases by a vote of two to one.

Again this year, Secretary of Labor Mitchell, when he came before our committee, recommended all of these provisions. Although they may be somewhat different in language, they are a part of the administration's program. Most of them have been endorsed by the Senate by a rather large vote, and by a rather large vote in the committee. If accepted, I believe they will help the passage of the bill in the House of Representatives.

For that reason, while what the Senator from North Carolina has said is quite effective and deserves careful consideration, yet in my judgment, the provisions of title VI will help the bill toward its ultimate passage, rather than hinder it. That is the reason why we were going ahead with what I know the Senator from North Carolina quite responsibly feels is a somewhat dangerous course. But that is the reason for the course. That is the reason why, as of today, I feel we should proceed with these amendments to the Taft-Hartley law in the bill.

Mr. ERVIN. Title VI contains six amendments which deal with the Taft-Hartley Act. Only two of them were adopted by the Senate at its last session as parts of the Kennedy-Ives bill; namely, section 602, which is in the same form in which it passed the Senate in the Kennedy-Ives bill——

Mr. KENNEDY. It was agreed to by a vote of 60 to 29.

Mr. ERVIN. Yes. It is in the same condition in which it appeared in Senate bill 505 as originally introduced.

The other provision which passed the Senate in the Kennedy-Ives bill, and which was in Senate bill 505 when it was originally introduced, is found in section 603. That is the section which makes so-called economic strikers eligible to vote in representation elections held during a labor controversy.

Section 605 in the pending bill, which is the so-called quickie election provision, has never passed the Senate, a somewhat similar quickie election provision in the Kennedy-Ives bill was actually struck out by the Senate. This particular section 605 was not adopted by the Senate last year, and was not in Senate bill 505 when it was introduced.

Another section which has been added by the committee is section 606. This, in my judgment, is the only noncontroversial proposal for the amendment of the Taft-Hartley Act. That section merely provides that the President may appoint an acting general counsel when there is no regular general counsel.

Another amendment which was added by the committee is section 604, which provides that the term "supervisor"— shall not be construed to include service assistants in the communication industry.

I think that amendment and the one relating to the no man's land in the field of labor law, as reported by the committee, should be eliminated—I started to say on their merits—but I will say, instead, on their demerits.

When the no man's land provision was adopted by the Senate last year, and when it was incorporated in the original bill this year, it was very simple and direct. It provided that the National Labor Relations Board should take jurisdiction of all controversies arising under the Taft-Hartley Act.

It contained a provision, however, to the effect that wherever a State had established an agency, under State law, which conformed to the Taft-Hartley Act, the National Labor Relations Board could cede to such State agency the enforcement of the Taft-Hartley Act in instances, when the impact of the alleged controversy on interstate commerce was not substantial.

Before I discuss the no man's land provision in the pending bill, I wish to commend the committee for its hard work. In particular, I wish to commend the very able and distinguished junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY]. I have never known a Member of the Senate to work harder on any matter than the junior Senator from Massachusetts has worked on this, not only during the present session, but also during the last session.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. ERVIN. And I wish to commend him for his study, his courage, and the high degree of intelligence he has brought to this task.

I wish to say that I think the provisions of the first 5 titles are as fine as can be devised to deal with malpractices in the internal affairs of unions; and I like the approach of these titles better than that of other measures, because, as the able Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] said a few moments ago, these titles go along with the Anglo-Saxon principle of justice, in that they visit the consequences of their sins upon the sinners, rather than upon the innocent.

But I think the no man's land provision as reported by the committee should be stricken out on its demerits; and the same statement applies to the provision about supervisors in the communications industry.

The Taft-Hartley Act has always proceeded on the theory that it is a general law, and that whether a particular person is to be regarded as a supervisor is to be determined by the uniform definition contained in the law applying to all industries.

But section 604 contains the provision that the term "supervisor"— shall not be construed to include service assistants in the communications industry.

No definition of "service assistants" is to be found in the act. Apparently that is a title which is assigned to certain persons by the communications industry; and if that industry were to change the title of such persons, we might wind up by finding that for all practical purposes the telephone industry or some other communications industry had amended an act of Congress.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RANDOLPH in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield.

Mr. KENNEDY. On the point of whether these amendments should be included in the bill, let me say that I am not sure that I agree with the Senator's count of what was done last year and what was done this year.

The no-man's-land amendment is now in somewhat different form than its form of last year, when it was approved by the Senate when it passed the McClellan bill.

The construction-trades amendment is the same as the amendment which was adopted by the Senate last year by a vote of 60 to 29.

In regard to the economic strikers' provision, we have included language identical to that suggested by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STENNIS], which was adopted unanimously by the Senate on a voice vote.

In the case of the supervisors, the Senator from North Carolina will remember that the language the bill contained last year—and I was never completely happy about it—was adopted by the Senate by a vote of 47 to 38.

In order to perfect the legislative provisions in regard to the definition of supervisors, we confined this language to a small segment of the communications industry. Ninety-five percent of the service assistants are now in a union organization; but there has been some feeling that the Board should change the previous interpretations, which have caused considerable difficulty within the communications industry.

Those we are discussing are the ones at the telephone company to whom we talk when we cannot get a particular telephone number. Then we ask for the supervisor; and the supervisor then comes to the telephone. She is a telephone operator; she is not a supervisor in the sense of being one who has to do with the disciplining of employees. In short, she is not a supervisor in the traditional sense.

I repeat that 95 percent of the supervisors are now in a union organization. We are not attempting to disturb the existing pattern.

This amendment is greatly improved over the corresponding provision of last year's bill; and I think this amendment is not greatly controversial, although some may disagree.

In the case of the prehearing elections amendment, let me state that the sponsor is the distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN]. He will remember that in his very fine remarks in regard to the Coffee case, he criticized the Board for not having taken quick enough action—with the result that Mr. Coffee was put out of business. As a result of that statement by the Senator from North Carolina, which I thought was effective, and also as a result of a recommendation by Mr. Leedom, of the Board, it was felt that there should be swifter procedure in such elections, rather than have either the union or management draw out the case so long so that either one would be ruined financially.

The prehearing election amendment, which I believe is quite adequately safeguarded now, and is better than the administration language we had at first, was recommended by the administration to deal with cases similar to the Coffee case, which was considered by the McClellan committee; and I think the amendment will accomplish a good deal to speed up the procedures of the Board. I think this amendment comes under the general purposes for which the McClellan committee was established.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I deny that this section harmonizes with what I said in that case. Instead, it is exactly the opposite. In that case the validity of the election was challenged after the election was held.

As a matter of fact, this provision of the pending bill will permit the very thing that happened in the Coffee case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time the Senator from North Carolina has yielded to himself has expired.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I yield myself an additional 10 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina is recognized for an additional 10 minutes.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, this provision of the bill would allow the election to be held first, and thereafter the validity of the election could be considered and determined. I think that is what occurred in the Coffee case, in which an election was held, but the votes were not allowed to be counted for several months.

Under this provision of the pending bill, the election would be held and then there would be a decision as to whether the election should have been held in the first place. I believe it would be better to decide that question in advance.

Mr. KENNEDY. In connection with this point, let me quote from a statement by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN] himself:

> But it seems to me as if Congress is going to have to step in and pass some kind of a law to give a man a right of action, where any party takes and maliciously abuses the adjudicatory processes under the National Labor Relations Board.

We are attempting to get at the following: If a union is the bargaining union for a thousand persons, and if there is a question as to whether 50 of them should be permitted to vote in an election, it is possible for the employer or the union to drag out the case for month after month, while the Board considers whether those persons should be permitted to vote.

We propose that, after due notice to both parties, the election be held. It might be that the union would win the election by 850 votes to 50 votes; so it would make no particular difference whether the 50 in question were held to be in the bargaining union.

That is why we believe this provision will speed up the procedures of the National Labor Relations Board, but will not lessen the legitimate rights of either the union or the management.

Mr. ERVIN. This language is an improvement over that contained in the Kennedy-Ives bill, in that this language does include some safeguards which were not included in the similar provision of the Kennedy-Ives bill.

On the other hand, this provision will permit a repetition of what happened in the Coffee case, where an election was held in January, but it took until April to decide whether the election was valid although only a half dozen votes were involved. Matters of this nature ought to be determined before an election is held.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I should be glad to yield myself time from the time available——

Mr. ERVIN. I yield to the Senator from Arizona whatever time he may require.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. President, I think the colloquy we have just heard points up very adequately why the amendment of the distinguished Senator from North Carolina should receive adequate and favorable consideration.

At the outset, I wish to point out that I have said, right along, that we should deal only with Taft-Hartley Act amendments which would apply to discrepancies and wrongdoings which have been disclosed by the McClellan committee.

At one time or another I suggested to various Members on the Democratic side of the aisle that we specifically confine the Taft-Hartley Act amendments to those areas.

I cannot quite agree with my good friend, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], when he says these amendments are not controversial. In many respects these are the same amendments which were so controversial last year, and which I think was the reason why the bill was not passed last year by the House of Representatives.

I should like to see the Taft-Hartley amendments include the field of secondary boycotts and picketing, and I am hopeful amendments to that effect will prevail.

I have said that without such amendments this cannot be meaningful legislation. The subject which was just discussed, namely, supervisors, is a good example of what my concern is. By no stretch of the imagination has the McClellan committee disclosed any need for changing the description of supervisor. In fact, if the Senator will read the hearings of last year, he will find very little testimony on that subject was taken. As I recall, it was confined to 200 words on the National Labor Relations Board side, and about 1,200 words on the side of one of the members of the committee.

If the supervisor clause remains in the bill, even if modified—and I may say it has been modified to a very marked degree—there is a question in my mind as to what effect there will be on the small telephone companies, which may not employ a person designated as a supervisor, but such an employee in a small telephone company may become subject to our labor laws whereas he is not now subject to them.

Mr. ERVIN. Does not the Senator think my point valid on that question? It is this: If we are going to amend the Taft-Hartley Act, amendments to it should provide definitions which will apply, generally, instead of relating to a particular position in a particular industry. The industry in question may change the title of that position.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I agree with the Senator, but my fear is that if now, for the first time, we pick out a specific industry and change the definition of the duties of a member of that industry to entitle him to the benefits under this act, it is not beyond reason to assume that next year we may be asked to make a change here, there, and every other place in the field, and we may wind up with such a condition that the only individuals in a company who will not be covered by the act will be the president and the vice president. The labor organization might slowly take over the prerogatives of management, which I am convinced no thinking labor leader wants to have happen. My basic fear is not so much over what we are asked to do in this instance; it is what we might be doing by way of precedent that concerns me. As I have said many times before, in this body and other places, I feel the secondary boycott ban and the ban on blackmail picketing should be a part of the Taft-Hartley amendments. It is difficult for me to understand why the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee would leave these two items out when they are applicable to the situations disclosed by the McClellan committee.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield.

Mr. KENNEDY. It is because I think the subjects are so extremely complicated and so extremely controversial that, if added to this bill, the odds would be against the bill's ever reaching the President's desk. That is why I am opposed to such an amendment. In the amendments the Senator has drawn dealing with picketing and boycott, he has not included amendments identical with what the administration amendments proposed.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I agree.

Mr. KENNEDY. When a member of the committee offers amendments on the floor which are not the same as the ones he offered some time ago, it indicates how difficult it is to write such amendments.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is aware of the fact that after the majority had agreed on a no man's land procedure, at the next meeting the Members disagreed. I do not say this subject is noncontroversial. I say all amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act, in both the administration's proposal and the Kennedy bill, are controversial. If we are to have a controversy, why not go ahead and have a little more extended controversy, and include the two fields which I feel must be covered if we are to enact effective legislation?

I am not afraid of any argument which may come up on the floor of the Senate about secondary boycotting and picketing. If we could have some kind of unanimous-consent agreement that there would be no other field explored in the Taft-Hartley law, I would be perfectly willing to join in such an agreement; but I do not feel we can pass meaningful legislation without covering those two fields.

Mr. KENNEDY. In other words, if title VI had been stricken out, the Senator from Arizona would agree to putting aside boycotting and picketing amendments.

Mr. GOLDWATER. If we had agreed to strike title VI, I would be agreeable to limiting the field only to boycotts and picketing.

Mr. KENNEDY. If we could have stricken out title VI, the Senator would have agreed to what?

Mr. GOLDWATER. That if we could have had a general agreement or a unanimous-consent agreement that title VI would be stricken, I would be willing to agree that the only fields in the Taft-Hartley law to be covered would be boycott and picketing.

Mr. KENNEDY. I do not see how the Senator from Arizona can be a successful businessman. That is one of the worst deals I have ever heard of. When I say something is noncontroversial, I always exempt the Senator from Arizona. What I mean is that the Republican leadership on the other side of the aisle is in agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANSFIELD in the chair). The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield myself 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona has no time to yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I said I was in a rather embarrassing position of borrowing time from the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are the Senator from North Carolina and the Senator from Massachusetts willing to yield 5 minutes each to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes.

Mr. ERVIN. Yes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I was hoping the Senator from Massachusetts would agree to a unanimous-consent agreement whereby we could get to the fields of secondary boycott and picketing, and, with that exception, forget all about title VI. I assure him the question would be much less controversial than he thinks it would be.

I do not want to take any more time of my friend from North Carolina. I will speak to this subject later, if I can find time to do so. Possibly my friend from Massachusetts will yield me time.

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes; I shall be glad to yield the Senator time.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I do not want to elaborate on the subject now.

In closing my discussion, I feel that if we act in the field of the Taft-Hartley law and do not include secondary boycott and picketing, we are really undercutting the so-called blue ribbon committee which the Senator from Massachusetts and I selected, and which is busily engaged in drawing up their recommendations in the Taft-Hartley field. We are taking up recommendations in the Taft-Hartley field which have not been based on any disclosure at all by the McClellan hearings, and we are leaving out legislation in the field of secondary boycott and picketing, without which I do not think we can in truth say to the American people, "Here is a labor reform bill."

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I have a proposition I will make to every Member of the Senate. If the Senate will adopt my amendment and thus strike out the nongermane Taft-Hartley amendments, as it ought to do, I will enter into a gentleman's agreement to join Senators in voting down every other nongermane Taft-Hartley amendment to the pending bill, including the ones I think ought to be made law. I am willing to do that and take a chance on their being embodied in a later bill. That procedure would afford me great relief, because it would result in giving protection to the members of unions now controlled by dictatorial or corrupt officers—men who now have no protection.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ERVIN. Yes; I am glad to yield to the distinguished Senator from Arkansas, who has done such a fine job as head of the McClellan committee.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I thank the Senator, who is also on the committee, and whose services on that committee have contributed greatly to the disclosures which have been made by the committee.

Mr. President, I wish to endorse what I understood the distinguished Senator to say with reference to the Taft-Hartley Act amendments. At the time I introduced S. 1137, I stated on the floor of the Senate that it did not deal with any Taft-Hartley amendments or revision.

I said at that time, Mr. President, that since the revision of the Taft-Hartley Act was highly controversial and since no one could maintain that some reform legislation was not needed in connection with corruption, the internal operation of unions, and their administration, I felt we should concentrate on that matter and get as good a bill as we could get to deal with that matter alone, later bringing in at the present session of Congress a separate bill which would provide a vehicle for offering amendments any Senator might have in mind to revise the Taft-Hartley Act.

I endorse what the able Senator from North Carolina has said. I should be happy to join with him in that regard, but I point out that there are only two real Taft-Hartley Act amendments which I think anyone would argue about in connection with the bill under consideration. One of them is not in title VI. One of them is subsection (3) on page 25, dealing with the shakedown picketing.

My understanding is that the Hobbs Act already covers that matter with a much heavier penalty than would be provided by the proposed legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANSFIELD in the chair). The time of the Senator from North Carolina has again expired.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. McCLELLAN. The Justice Department is greatly concerned about what we are proposing to do to the Hobbs Act, which provides a penalty for extortion up to as high as 20 years imprisonment, whereas the bill under consideration would reduce the penalty, as I recall, to 1 year. That is a serious matter.

An attempt, which really amounts to nothing, is made to deal with the no man's land problem in title VI. If Senators agreed to eliminate title VI, I would agree not to offer to the bill under consideration any amendments for the revision of the Taft-Hartley Act.

I maintain the duty would then devolve upon the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare to report a bill dealing with the revision of the Taft-Hartley Act in the present session of Congress. Then we could fight out these controversial matters. I would not wish to jeopardize the enactment in some form or another, of the bill presently under consideration, for I believe we all agree the bill should be passed and passed immediately.

Mr. ERVIN. I rejoice in the fact that the position of the Senator from Arkansas with regard to the wise course to pursue under present circumstances conforms to my views. As I understand it, the Senator agrees with me that if we strike out all nongermane Taft-Hartley Act amendments and other amendments not germane to the primary objective of this particular bill, and refuse to consider any more such amendments, we can get speedy passage of the bill to cover this field, but that we are likely not to get any legislation passed if we try to mix all these things up together.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield.

Mr. McCLELLAN. There is some danger—I do not know how great it is, and no one can foretell—that we may finally get no legislation, as happened last year.

With the convictions I have, I certainly cannot remain silent on this floor and let title VI and the other provision to which I have referred stay in the bill without offering amendments which I think are important in the field of revision of the Taft-Hartley Act. If one amendment goes in, others are bound to be offered.

Mr. ERVIN. That is the point I have been trying to make. So long as any nongermane amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act remain in the bill, there is an invitation to every Member of the Senate to offer such amendments as he thinks ought to be made to the Taft-Hartley Act, and each Senator is perfectly justified in taking that position, because he might well come to the conclusion that this will be the only opportunity he will have to accomplish that end.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from North Carolina has again expired.

Mr. ERVIN. How much time have I used, Mr. President; or, how much of my time has been used?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina has 132 minutes remaining. The Senator has used 48 minutes.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield some time to me?

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PROUTY. That will be sufficient.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. PROUTY. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from North Carolina a question with regard to the threats which are reported to have been made by certain prominent labor leaders, who were quoted as saying, in effect, that in the event title VI were stricken from the bill they would work actively against passage of the bill as a whole. Does the distinguished Senator think that is a matter to which we should give some thought?

Mr. ERVIN. I can answer only for myself. I do not succumb to threats.

I cannot really think that the leaders of organized labor are so short of statesmanship as to oppose the passage of this bill merely because they cannot get some amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act written into it. Surely they will not oppose a bill which prohibits taking unrepentant convicted felons out of penitentiaries and placing them in positions of authority over honest union men, as was done in a number of instances, as shown by the McClellan committee investigation.

I cannot really believe the leaders of organized labor will take the position that we should pass no legislation to prevent corrupt union leaders from plundering the treasuries of unions.

I cannot really believe that labor leaders would oppose passage of legislation which would give the rank-and-file members of unions a voice in their own affairs in unions in which they have been long denied such voice. The investigations of the select committee revealed one union in which over 50 percent of the dues-paying members did not have a right to vote, under the union's constitution. I cannot really believe any responsible American labor leader would adopt such a shortsighted policy.

Mr. PROUTY. I certainly hope the Senator is correct in that assumption.

Mr. ERVIN. After all, so far as I am concerned, I am going to try to have enacted legislation which will serve what I conceive to be the best interests of the American people. By reason of my service on the Senate Rackets Committee, I am convinced the first five titles of the pending bill, with the exception of the amendments which do not relate to the field of internal affairs of unions, ought to be made law just as speedily as possible. Certainly that is an event which will happen if we strike out all nongermane amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act, and refuse to allow any more to be written into the bill under consideration.

Mr. PROUTY. Assuming that the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina is agreed to, can either the Senator from North Carolina or the junior Senator from Massachusetts, with some degree of assurance, make any statement as to when action will be taken on a bill to amend the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. ERVIN. I regret very much that I cannot answer the question of the able and distinguished Senator from Vermont. I am not a member of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

Mr. PROUTY. I am a member of the committee, and I have no idea when such an action would be forthcoming. I believe the commission which was appointed is supposed to report sometime around the first of June. Obviously, since the proposed legislation would be very controversial, it would be considered at great length by the subcommittee and by the full committee. I think we can definitely say no legislation of that character will be enacted at the present session of Congress, and perhaps not next year.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I desire to speak to that point very briefly. We have two alternatives if we retain nongermane Taft-Hartley amendments in the bill. One is to enact no legislation. The other is to mangle the Taft-Hartley Act.

In my native county of Burke many years ago there was a bricklayer named John Watts. He took a notion that he was called to preach. His skill as a bricklayer was considerable, but his knowledge of theology was otherwise.

One of his neighbors who was named Job Hicks happened to go by the little country church where John was preaching one Sunday afternoon. Job Hicks had had several drinks of Burke County corn, which is alleged to be a very potent beverage. As Job staggered by the church, he saw John up in the pulpit attempting to expound the scriptures. Job staggered up the aisle, grabbed John by the coat collar, dragged him to the door of the church, and threw him out.

Job was subsequently tried and convicted for disturbing a religious meeting. He was convicted by a jury. When Judge Robinson, the presiding judge, called Job up for sentence, he said, with a very stern countenance, "Now, Job, when you were guilty of this violent conduct on a Sabbath day, you must have been so drunk as not to realize what you were doing." Job Hicks replied, "Your Honor, it is true I had had several drinks. But I would not want Your Honor to think I was so drunk that I could stand by and see the word of the Lord 'mummicked up' like that without doing something about it."

If we try to rewrite the Taft-Hartley law on the floor of the Senate, the Taft-Hartley law will be "mummicked up." It would be "mummicked up" by the so-called no man's land provision reported by the committee. Under this provision the National Labor Relations Board would delegate to an agency created by a State the power to enforce Federal law, if the State agency were authorized by the State law to accept the delegated power. The State agency would then become an agent of the Federal Government instead of an agent of the State for the purpose of the Taft-Hartley Act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. ERVIN. I yield myself 5 additional minutes. Under this provision, any orders which the State agency issues could be enforced only by the National Labor Relations Board, and could be enforced only in the Federal courts. There is not a State agency in the United States which would have the power, under State law, to enter into any such agreement with the National Labor Relations Board. There is not a State that would be willing to have its State agencies robbed of the power, under State law, to resort to State courts.

Then there is the provision that the State agency which is established by the State to give protection to its citizens may not even seek temporary preventive relief without the consent of the National Labor Relations Board. This would mean "mummicking up" the no-man's-land provision, which was originally in the bill. I do not believe that there is a State in the country which has a statute on its books authorizing any State agency to convert itself into such a helpless tribunal.

This proposal proves what I have been saying, namely, that if we attempt to write Taft-Hartley amendments into this bill while we are primarily concerned with malpractice in the internal affairs of unions, we are in danger of obtaining no legislation on the one hand or mangling Taft-Hartley Act on the other.

So the question before us is simply this: Shall we strike out the nongermane Taft-Hartley amendments and pass a bill to give protection to persons who now have no protection under existing law or at the hands of existing enforcement agencies?

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield.

Mr. PROUTY. I agree completely with the Senator with respect to his comments on the so-called no-man's-land provision in the present bill. I think it is meaningless, impracticable, and impossible of administration. But I believe that there is an approach which would relieve the situation to some extent. I have several amendments directed to that end. I think they give proper consideration to the question, and if they are properly explained and understood, we can remedy that situation to some degree now. I think it is vitally important to the small businessman and the small union that they have relief in this field, which relief is not available to them under present law.

Mr. ERVIN. What the Senator says emphasizes the point I have been trying to make. It is a disgrace to our country when people suffer wrongs, and are denied any remedy for such wrongs. We should make a conscientious effort to correct the situation which exists in this field. I think it can best be done by considering those questions in a separate bill, rather than in a bill which deals primarily with other things.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield 1 minute to me?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I do not believe I stated a moment ago—but I will restate it for the RECORD if I did—that if title VI remains in the bill, and if the section relating to shakedown picketing, as it is commonly known, remains in the bill, I propose to offer four amendments, all in the nature of bills which I have previously introduced, and which are now before the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

One amendment would deal with picketing, so as to make recognition and organizational picketing unlawful. Therein lies the great power of the Teamsters, the Hoffas, and their element. They can place a picket line around a small business and cut off its supplies. The small businessman must either join a union or go out of business.

I propose to offer an amendment regarding the so-called no man's land which will have meaning, and which will require the National Labor Relations Board to say what it will take jurisdiction of, and what it will not take jurisdiction of. It would place the jurisdiction in the State courts and State agencies, where it belongs.

We have a preemption problem. If the Taft-Hartley law preempts the States, then, as the distinguished Senator from North Carolina has pointed out, we should not have a board which will say, "Although we could take jurisdiction, we will not. Therefore we are going to leave without a remedy someone who has been greatly wronged." If the Board is to say that, then Congress has the duty of placing the power back in the State agency, where it belongs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield me 1 minute more?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield 1 minute more to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Then I propose to offer an amendment relating to the secondary boycott, to strengthen the law so as to prevent any union official from saying to a customer of a manufacturer a thousand miles away from the scene of the dispute, "You can no longer handle the products of that manufacturer," and place a picket line around his establishment. It would prevent any union official from saying to such a businessman, "If you handle the products of a certain manufacturer, we will picket your place and shut off your supplies, and embarrass customers who come here to deal with you."

Fourth, I propose to outlaw the so-called hot cargo contracts. I think they are absolutely wrong, and should not be tolerated in a free society and a free economy.

Those are the proposals I intend to offer if title VI remains in the bill, and if the picketing provision remains in it.

Mr. ERVIN. I yield 5 minutes to the able and distinguished senior Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND].

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator from North Carolina.

I warmly thank the Senator from Arkansas for his announced intention, in the event title VI is not eliminated, as I hope it will be, and the other provision which he has mentioned is not eliminated, to offer some really meaningful amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act. He will have the support of at least one other Senator, the Senator from Florida.

I believe that the bill, insofar as its puny attempts to amend the Taft-Hartley Act are concerned, is contemptuous of the hard work of the committee which the Senator from Arkansas has so ably headed, and from which he has brought forth so many findings in which the people are interested. The bill is contemptuous of the attitude of the good people of the Nation, including millions who are within the labor organizations, and who know perfectly well that changes should be made for their protection, as well as for the protection of the general public.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks Senate bill 1386, introduced by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas, which he expects to propose as an amendment in this debate, on the subject of requiring the National Labor Relations Board to indicate promptly what it does not intend to take jurisdiction of, and allowing the States to take jurisdiction in those fields.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 1386) to amend the National Labor Relations Act so as to permit the exercise by the States of jurisdiction over labor disputes to which such act applies but over which the National Labor Relations Board does not exercise jurisdiction, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 14 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof a new subsection as follows:

"(c)(1) Within thirty days after the date of enactment of this subsection, the Board shall clearly establish and publish, by rule or otherwise, such limitations on its exercise of jurisdiction as it proposes to observe for the purpose of excluding from its jurisdiction those labor disputes which, in the opinion of the Board, do not have sufficient effect on commerce to warrant the exercise of its jurisdiction.

"(2) The Board in the same manner may establish and publish modifications of such limitations on its exercise of jurisdiction as it has established pursuant to paragraph (1), but no such modification shall have the effect of staying or otherwise affecting any proceeding duly instituted before any appropriate court or agency of any State or Territory (including the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Guam, and the Virgin Islands) prior to the expiration of thirty days' publication of such modification.

"(3) In any case or class of cases involving a labor dispute or labor disputes which the Board, pursuant to paragraphs (1) and (2), has excluded from its exercise of jurisdiction, or in any case in which the Board is precluded from exercising jurisdiction because of the failure of a labor organization to file any report or other data as required by law, no court or agency of any State or Territory (including the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Guam, and the Virgin Islands) shall be precluded from asserting jurisdiction by virtue of the fact that such case or class of cases involves a labor dispute or labor disputes affecting commerce.

"(4) Any person may petition the Board for a determination as to whether a particular case involving a labor dispute falls within the limitations on its exercise of jurisdiction established pursuant to paragraphs (1) and (2). Notice of such petition and its contents shall be given contemporaneously by the petitioner to any known interested person or his representative, and such notice shall have the effect of staying any proceeding to which the petition refers explicitly, and to which both petitioner and any person or persons given such notice are the parties. Any person given notice may file an answer with the Board not later than ten days after receiving such notice. The Board's determination, unless arbitrary, shall be final and binding upon the petitioner and upon all parties notified by petitioner as provided in this paragraph. If the Board should make no determination within thirty days after the filing of the initial petition, it shall be presumed that the Board has determined to be outside its jurisdiction any case to which the petition explicitly refers, and to which petitioner and any person or persons given appropriate notice are the parties."

SEC. 2. Section 10(a) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is amended by repealing the proviso thereto.

Mr. HOLLAND. I am also deeply concerned about another subject matter, namely, the attitude of the National Labor Relations Board toward the hotels of the Nation. The hotels in my own State and in every other State are independent enterprises, in the main; enterprises which are intrastate in character; enterprises which, because of their great variety of character, are entitled to much latitude in solving their own problems.

It is clear to me that, in the original enactment of the Taft-Hartley law, it was made plain, by the record of the debate in that particular controversy, that hotels were not to be included. I believe that from the standpoint of legislative history, that debate still controls. It is still in the legislative record of the Taft-Hartley Act.

I wish to place in the RECORD certain quotations showing how clearly it was indicated that hotels were not intended to be included. I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 95, part 9, page 12471. Senator Taft said:

In recent years we have seen a growing tendency on the part of the administrative agencies to extend their jurisdiction in fields previously reserved for State action. Merely because a local retail or service industry receives merchandise which has crossed State lines, it does not follow, in my opinion, that the local enterprise is one which affects interstate commerce. A hotel performs its services within four walls. It ships nothing into commerce. It produces no goods for commerce. In my opinion that act was never intended to cover the hotel industry.

Senator Pepper, formerly my distinguished colleague, and certainly an able advocate of the labor cause, then asked this question of Senator Taft:

Would the statement just made by the able Senator from Ohio apply equally to resort hotels, as well as commercial hotels, serving the general public?

The answer of Senator Taft was:

I do not believe that the act was ever intended to cover any part of the hotel industry, as we know it, whether we are considering resort hotels or the more common commercial hotel found in both cities and small towns. At least, I am sure that such was never my intention.

Mr. President, only one question was presented in the recent Supreme Court case—in the case of Hotel Employees Local 255 against the National Labor Relations Board—and that was whether the Board—the NLRB—could decline to assert jurisdiction solely on the basis of a longstanding policy, and the Court decided that single question in the negative.

It is inconceivable to me how this could be interpreted to require the NLRB to take jurisdiction over labor disputes in the hotel industry.

I hope that it will be made abundantly clear in the course of this debate, as it was then, that it is not the intention of Congress to assert Federal jurisdiction over purely intrastate businesses such as the hotel business.

So far as I am concerned, I stand ready to support the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN] on this subject matter, and any other proposal which makes it clear that intrastate business is not being brought under the jurisdiction of NLRB.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I have already agreed to yield first to the Senator from Louisiana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In order that we may have control of the time, does the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. ERVIN] yield additional time to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. ERVIN. I yield 4 additional minutes to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. ELLENDER. Mr. President, I wish to join my good friend from Florida in asserting that it was never the intention under the Taft-Hartley Act to include hotels.

As some Senators may recall, I served on the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare until I surrendered my position on that committee to accept membership on the Senate Committee on Appropriations. I held hearings for almost 6 years for the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare before the Taft-Hartley Act was enacted into law. I also served on the conference committee which drafted the Taft-Hartley Act in its present form. At no time was it the intention to incorporate hotels under the Taft-Hartley Act. As a matter of fact, the question came up often, and we just as often determined that hotels should remain outside the Board's jurisdiction.

As the distinguished Senator from Florida has pointed out, certainly a man like Senator Taft, who was a great lawyer, as well as the former colleague of the Senator from Florida, Senator Pepper, elicited the facts as they have been stated; namely, that it was never the intention of those who fostered the Taft-Hartley Act to include hotels, which are purely intrastate businesses.

I compliment my good friend from Florida on bringing this matter up. I am hopeful that with respect to hotels those who are now in charge of the bill will take the same position which was taken when the original Taft-Hartley Act was first discussed on the floor of the Senate.

In this connection, I might state that I have read with interest the Supreme Court decision which supposedly has stripped the NLRB of its authority to decline to entertain hotel cases. As I understand that brief opinion, it merely states that the Board cannot refuse to include the hotel industry within its jurisdiction solely on the basis of longstanding policy.

Let me emphasize again that I believe the legislative history of the Taft-Hartley Act is replete with evidence that it was never the intent of Congress to bring hotels within the coverage of the act. However, above and beyond that, I most respectfully submit that the Supreme Court was 100 percent wrong in its interpretation of the law, and the opinion it rendered. However, I think it is important to recognize that there is nothing in the Court's opinion which compels the Board to refuse to entertain hotel suits on grounds other than longstanding policy.

Now, the hotel case referred to cites as authority an earlier case, involving the issue of whether the Board must take jurisdiction over employees of a labor union, when such union is acting as an employer. In my opinion, the Court's reference to that case as grounds for its decision in the hotel case is entirely incorrect. In Office Employees v. Labor Board (353 U.S. 313), the Court found, and I quote:

This is particularly true when we consider the pointed language of the Congress—repeted in Taft-Hartley in 1947—that unions shall not be excluded when acting as employers.

In other words, in that case, specific language of the act denied the union the immunity from Taft-Hartley jurisdiction which it was claiming. In the hotel workers case, not only is the act silent, but the legislative history demonstrates conclusively that the Congress intended to exempt hotels from its operation.

Frankly, I am of the opinion that even section 601 of the pending bill does not, of necessity, bring hotels within the purview of the Board. It refers only to the fact that the Board should exercise its jurisdiction to the full extent permitted by the commerce clause. For my own part, I have extreme difficulty in believing that such purely intrastate operations as hotels could, by any stretch of this imagination, be construed to be in interstate commerce.

I am most hopeful, Mr. President, that the Senators handling this bill will take a reasonable position on this matter, and that they will hew to the line adopted by those of us who worked so long and hard on Taft-Hartley, namely, that hotels should not be subjected to NLRB jurisdiction.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Do I understand my good friend from Florida to contend that the Miami hotels are primarily intrastate in character and do not get a large proportion of their patronage from outside Florida?

I have had the privilege of visiting Miami only once. However, it seems to me that the overwhelming number of people who go to the hotels in Miami come from New York and from Chicago and from other places outside of Florida.

Every Sunday I read in the New York Times several pages of advertisements by Miami hotels trying to induce well-to-do New Yorkers to come to the bright sunshine of Florida and to leave their money there. Do I understand the Senator from Florida to say that the Miami hotels are primarily patronized by Floridians?

Mr. HOLLAND. I did not make that statement. I shall never make that statement. We are happy to have a place where citizens from Illinois and from other States like to visit.

However, I am happy always to depend upon the RECORD for the intent of Congress in the passage of legislation. I note that my former colleague, Senator Pepper, who certainly is as liberal as the distinguished Senator from Illinois, and certainly is as much interested in the labor union cause as is the distinguished Senator from Illinois, was not satisfied by the earlier answer of Senator Taft, which I have already quoted, and therefore asked this question of Senator Taft:

> Would the statement just made by the able Senator from Ohio apply equally to resort hotels, as well as commercial hotels, serving the general public?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. ERVIN. I yield 3 additional minutes to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. DOUGLAS. May I ask another question?

Mr. HOLLAND. I shall yield again after I have finished answering the Senator's observation. My feeling is that there could not have been made a clearer case for the exemption of hotels generally, and resort hotels also, from the coverage of the Taft-Hartley Act.

When I saw that the present Supreme Court, which is always anxious to extend Federal jurisdiction into every conceivable corner, had again avoided ruling on that question in the recent case, I was even surer than I was before that no justification exists for the extension of jurisdiction of the NLRB to hotels generally. The Court narrowed the question to the one question which I have already read into the RECORD; namely, can the National Labor Relations Board decline to assert jurisdiction solely on the basis of longstanding policy, and the Court very weakly said it could not. That is very different from a ruling that the NLRB had to take jurisdiction over hotels.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a statement?

Mr. HOLLAND. I yield for a question.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Preparatory to the question let me say that the Senator from Florida has now retreated from his contention that the Florida hotels are primarily engaged in intrastate business. He has apparently implicitly conceded that they are engaged in interstate business.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I invoke the rule. The Senator from Illinois is making a statement. He is not asking a question. I may say, however, that I have not retreated an inch. I still stand by the statement, clearly made in the RECORD during the earlier debate by Senator Taft, who certainly should have known something about his own act, to the effect that hotels do business within their four walls and render services on the spot, and that they are not engaged in interstate business; therefore the National Labor Relations Board was to have no jurisdiction over them.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HOLLAND. I am glad to yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is the Senator from Florida aware of the fact that the Taft-Hartley law was merely an amendment to the earlier Wagner Act, passed in 1935, and that the main jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board was mapped out by the Wagner Act, and that, excellent Senators as Senator Pepper and Senator Taft were, they were not in the Senate at the time when the Wagner Act was passed, and therefore their ex post facto interpretations do not constitute legislative history? Is the Senator aware of that fact?

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator from Florida is not aware of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The 3 additional minutes yielded to the Senator from Florida have expired.

Mr. ERVIN. I yield 1 additional minute to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator from Florida is aware of the fact that the contents of the Taft-Hartley Act are quite able to stand alone. The Senator from Florida participated in the debate.

The record of the debate will show that the Senator from Florida and the Senator from Ohio were the last two speakers before the final vote was had on that bill.

Unfortunately, the Senator from Illinois was not present at that time. If he had been present I believe he would have been better educated as to what was intended by the Senate and by Congress in the passage of that bill. It was never intended—as was so clearly shown by the record in many places—to extend coverage to intrastate businesses. It was never intended to cover hotels, because it was clearly observed by the leaders on both sides in the debate—the ranking Republican, Senator Taft, chairman of the Labor Committee, and the ranking Democrat on the committee, Senator Pepper—that no hotels of any sort were intended to be covered by the act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Florida has again expired.

Mr. CURTIS subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, following the colloquy between the distinguished Senator from Florida [Mr. HOLLAND], the distinguished Senator from Louisiana [Mr. ELLENDER], and the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], concerning the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board, a statement by me.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR CURTIS

I should like to state that I feel that decisions of the Supreme Court during the past 4 or 5 years have definitely beclouded the power of State courts to act in labor disputes, and legislation, I feel, is definitely needed to clarify this area. However, I feel that the courts have left the Board very broad discretion in deciding its own jurisdiction. I think that the cases have uniformly held that the Board can decline to exercise jurisdiction over disputes which, in its opinion, do not have a sufficient impact on commerce to warrant the exercise of jurisdiction. The courts have permitted the Board to decline to take cases both on an ad hoc basis and by the use of jurisdictional minimums under which the Board excluded cases involving business establishments having a dollar volume below a stated figure.

So far as I know, the courts have placed only two limitations upon the discretion of the Board in fixing its jurisdiction. In one of these cases, the Office Workers Union case, the Supreme Court held that the Board could not refuse to exercise jurisdiction where the employer was a labor union, since the Taft-Hartley Act specifically indicated that Congress intended the Board to treat unions as employers where they acted in that capacity. In other words, the Court stated that the Board has no discretion to decline a case when such decision flew directly in the face of the specific language of of the statute.

The second limitation imposed by the courts on the Board's discretion was included in the hotel workers case, where the Court stated that the Board could not refuse to exercise jurisdiction on the sole ground of a long-standing policy. I think it should be obvious to all that no administrative body can base any decision solely on a long-standing policy; that it must have some valid reasons to support a policy. As a matter of fact, in the hotel workers case the Board had based its decision upon reasons that it had previously cited in two other cases. The Supreme Court was not asked to pass upon the validity of the reasons cited by the Board in these cases. It was merely asked to rule on a single question of whether the Board could refuse to exercise jurisdiction on the sole ground of a longstanding policy, and the Supreme Court replied in the negative. It remanded the case to the district court for further proceedings, and placed but a single limitation upon the Board's discretion. As the distinguished Senator from Florida pointed out, the district court judge clearly understood the Supreme Court's decision, and the order he entered permits the National Labor Relations Board to decline to exercise jurisdiction over all hotels as a class, so long as the Board has any reason for doing so other than a long-standing policy unsupported by fact or reason.

Since the Board stated that it was issuing jurisdictional standards for hotels because of the Supreme Court's decision, it is obvious the Board misunderstands the Court. Therefore, it may be necessary for Congress to make it crystal clear that Congress intends the Board to devote its energies to labor disputes which have a substantial impact on interstate commerce, by giving it clearcut discretion to decline to exercise jurisdiction over purely local establishments such as hotels.

In his testimony before the Senate Labor Committee, just a month or two ago, Chairman Leedom referred to the tremendous backlog of cases now confronting the Board. He stated that this backlog arose simply because there are not enough hours in the day for the five Board members to weigh carefully all the facts in these difficult and complicated cases, to arrive at a proper decision, and to write opinions explaining such decisions. In view of this, it surprises me that the Board would voluntarily undertake to extend the use of its facilities to purely local establishments that have not heretofore been subject to the Board's jurisdiction. As a matter of fact, I wrote the Chairman a second letter February 4, in which I expressed the view that a careful study of the November 24 decision by the Supreme Court should dispel the delusion that the decision impaired the Board's discretionary powers.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed, without amendment, the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 19) authorizing the Architect of the Capitol to present to the Senators and Representative in the Congress from the State of Alaska the official flag of the United States bearing 49 stars which is first flown over the west front of the United States Capitol.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 2589) for the relief of Elizabeth Lucie Leon (also known as Lucie Noel).

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The message further announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (H. R. 5508) to provide for the free importation of articles for exhibition at fairs, exhibitions, or expositions, and for other purposes, and it was signed by the Vice President.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum, and I ask unanimous consent that the time for the quorum call be not charged to either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield, from my time, a half hour to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania.

MUTUAL SECURITY BUILDS FOR PEACE

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, this is a momentous occasion for me, as it would be for anyone to address this great body on a subject of major importance. It is natural that I should have given long and careful thought to the choice of a subject that would be fitting for such an occasion. I sought to select a topic of more than transitory concern to our Nation. I wanted also to discuss a subject on which there was a need for greater public understanding, in the hope that I might be able to add some degree of enlightenment on a matter of conspicuous importance to all Americans. It has occurred to me that one subject above all others which fits these standards is the position of the United States in the world community, as expressed in our role in the collective security system and the mutual security program which provides its strength.

THE PERSPECTIVE OF HISTORY

It is sometimes useful in considering contemporary events to try to visualize how they would appear to some one looking back on them from some point in the future. I believe that if we had the power to look back at ourselves a decade or a century from now, we would be able to see with greater clarity that this period in our national life is a historic time of testing—a testing of our moral fiber, our foresight, and wisdom as we face the gravest threat to our existence. To a large degree, these national qualities can be measured by our attitude toward our allies and the other free countries that share our danger and that look to us for leadership. The great issue is will our response today be mean spirited, petty, selfish, or will it be with mature determination to grapple energetically with the force arrayed against us? Will we give the free world confidence in our resolve to meet and surmount the dangers that confront us? Or will it be retreat, step by step, blindly clutching our material possessions of today and giving no heed to tomorrow?

Unless above himself he can project himself, how mean a thing is man.

THE MEASURE OF LEADERSHIP: OUR MUTUAL SECURITY PROGRAM

In a unique way, the action which we take on the mutual security program each year is the gage of our readiness to move forward decisively in a role we have no choice but to assume—the leadership of the free world in its resistance to Communist aggression and in the dramatic struggle of its less industrialized members to provide a better life for their peoples.

COLLECTIVE SECURITY AND THE MUTUAL SECURITY PROGRAM

The United States has progressed far since the Second World War in assuming the initiative and instilling courage in the other nations which stand firmly beside us against the Soviet threat. In working together, we and our friends have evolved a system of collective security symbolized in a series of treaties—NATO, SEATO, the Rio Pact, ANZUS, the Baghdad Pact, the bilateral agreements with Korea, Free China, and Japan. But these treaties in themselves are only shields of paper. If they are to have meaning, we must turn them into shields of steel, welded of men and arms and economic strength. Through the mutual security program, we add our share of the ingredients to the collective security system we have created to produce free world defenses that are an alloy of toughness and resilience.

Without the money, modern arms, commodities, and economic progress which are needed to build the security of the free world, our common defense agreements would be little more than monuments of good intentions. The armies that would stand between our own shores and Communist military might would be pitifully outmatched. The societies of strategic nations would be easy marks for Communist infiltration and economic penetration.

It seems wholly logical to me that when we share a common danger with other nations, we should band together to protect ourselves. Through the sharing of common danger in the past, we have become more alert to the unpredictable tests the future may present.

The sword must pass through fire, ere it can yield, fit instrument for man to wield.

It seems logical, therefore, that in mutuality of purpose we should help each other to achieve essential defensive strength. This is what we do through the mutual security program. It is astonishing to me that some people should see this program as wasteful, inefficient, hostile to our own interests; that it is a giveaway. What do we give, if it not be strength? What do we get if it not be greater strength? My own conviction, built up through careful study of the mutual security program during my terms of service in the other House, is that this program is an essential, primary tool of our collective security policy.

Mutual security has its roots in the Marshall plan of 1948, implemented by the 80th Congress; the North Atlantic Treaty of 1949; and the mutual defense assistance program of the same year for provision of arms and training to our European allies. Today, this defense-assistance program is an integral part of a coherent program of mutual security. It is the means by which we contribute our share of the common effort to buttress the strength of NATO and our other defense agreements.

Let us examine what we are being asked to contribute as our share. The President has proposed that we provide $1.6 billion of new appropriations for military assistance to our NATO allies and to other nations.

Let us examine what our allies are contributing to this effort. During the whole course of the military-assistance program from 1950 through 1959, the defense expenditures of our allies totaled $141 billion—more than six times our own expenditures of $22 billion in this common enterprise. During the calendar year 1958, our allies contributed $19 billion of their own money to support the forces we are now being asked to help to the total of $1.6 billion. They have made available to us, for our own forces, 250 bases in strategic locations. They provide 5 million men in the common defense, 14,000 jets, 24,000 combat vessels.

Let us think back on the occasions when the Soviet and Chinese Communists have sought to test our resolution and our strength. Let us think of the relentless pressure of Soviet and Chinese communism as it probes, first at one place, then at another, searching for a weak point in the barricade against its expansion: Greece, Iran, Korea, Berlin—first in 1949, and now again—Malaya, the Philippines, Indochina, the Middle East, the Formosa Straits. We may be thankful that we have helped arm these free world forces. We may be thankful, for example, that we are able, through the military-assistance program, to equip South Korean forces to defend the armed boundary against communism, without having to face the alternative of massive increases in our own forces in Korea, or reductions in our defenses to the extent of inviting a new Communist attack.

We may be thankful that because of the military equipment and training we provided Nationalist China, that nation was able to stand off the military might of Communist China in the battle over Quemoy—that the Nationalists, with American equipment and American training, were able to shoot down Communist Chinese aircraft in a ratio of 8 to 1. We may be particularly thankful that because local free world forces were able to contain this Communist attack, it did not break out into a major holocaust.

NATO IN THE NUCLEAR AGE

I point to the NATO area as another example of the success of collective security. Recently, the foreign ministers of the NATO countries joined in Washington to observe the 10th anniversary of that historic step. What have we accomplished? Through NATO's deterrent effect, peace has been preserved in Europe, and not an inch of European territory has since come under Soviet domination. Communist strength and influence in almost every NATO country have steadily declined. NATO in Europe have been modernized and built up from fewer than 20 ground divisions in 1950, to 100 active and reserve divisions today; from fewer than 1,000 aircraft, to 5,000 planes today, with 160 air bases available to NATO forces; and from 400 ships, to 1,700 combat vessels in today's fleets.

The firm position which we and our European allies are now taking in the present Berlin crisis is possible only because of the economic and military strength and the popular morale the Marshall plan and the military assistance program have helped create in Europe.

Today, with most of the NATO countries in good economic health, our support consists in large measure of assistance in modernization, including missiles to provide the allied command in Europe with capacity for atomic retaliation. We have much to show for the past 10 years; but we must continue to encourage and help our NATO allies in keeping their forces up-to-date, if the gains of the past are to be consolidated and projected into the future. I can think of nothing more dangerous than to adopt the attitude that because we have entered the nuclear era, we can neglect the forces in Europe that bar the way to 175 Red divisions. We cannot allow NATO defense to deteriorate or become obsolete while Soviet forces that face them are being equipped with the most modern products of Communist military technology.

The Congress is being asked, this year, to make nearly $43 billion available for our Armed Forces and for other defense purposes. This is a tremendous sum, but one well within our capacity to bear, when we set opposite it the towering threat to our lives, to our children, and to our freedom.

ADVICE FROM MILITARY STRATEGISTS

One fact that never ceases to amaze me is how we are heedful of the advice of our military leaders and experts in the expenditure of immense sums in the regular military budget, but we reject, or at least question, the same leaders' judgment when they offer the most potent arguments in favor of the military-assistance program, which is an integral part of our overall security plan. Mr. President, listen to the testimony of the Secretary of Defense before a committee of Congress this year:

> In my judgment it would be shortsighted indeed if this Nation spent over $40 billion in its own Military Establishment and then declined to spend the much smaller sums needed to maintain and modernize the forces of our allies which are essential to our whole defensive concept, and without which our own military expenditures would have to be enormously increased.

This is what we have been told by General Twining, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff:

> Without our military assistance program, the United States would require more men under arms both at home and overseas. If we were to maintain forces sufficient to match the Communist bloc in military strength or resources at points of possible aggression around the world, the cost to the United States would be far in excess of the $22 billion furnished under the military assistance program and the $141 billion spent by our allies during the years 1950 and 1958.

Last year, when General Twining was asked by a Member of Congress whether it was more important to restore the cuts in the mutual security program or to increase the regular defense budget, he replied that these dollars would better be spent in the defense of the Nation by putting them into mutual security. The chiefs of the individual military services endorsed his view.

Finally, the President himself declared, in his message to Congress, last month:

> Dollar for dollar, our expenditures for the mutual security program after we have once achieved a reasonable military posture for ourselves, will buy more security than far greater additional expenditures for our own forces.

DRAPER REPORT: DEFENSE IN DEPTH

Last summer, several members of the Foreign Relations Committee addressed to the President a thoughtful letter in which they expressed fear that we were overemphasizing military assistance at the expense of economic aid and technical assistance. Recognizing the legitimate concern that perhaps we were putting too much faith in building up military forces, and were neglecting the economic side, the President appointed a group of outstanding private citizens to study the question. Seven members were civilians with long experience in national and foreign affairs, three of them were eminent men who had retired from the military service. This group—the Draper Committee—was born in an atmosphere of doubt and questioning of the value of the military program. Yet the conclusion of the Draper Committee, based on a deep and thorough analysis of the program, and supplemented by study of the operation of the program in each geographic area, is that the spending on military assistance cannot be less than in recent years. Let me quote from one section of the Draper Committee's report:

> The free world's far flung defense perimeter is manned jointly by allied and U.S. forces and extends through Middle Europe, the Middle East, and around the rim of Asia to the Northern Pacific. The weapons for the allied forces defending this perimeter have very largely been furnished by our military assistance program. It is a very wide area important to our security. The nations of this area, without our help cannot defend it. Together we do have the strength. Within this perimeter are the homelands of our friends and allies and the means by which we together can maintain mutual bases, room for maneuver, defense in depth, and unrestricted use of the seas. This forward area, manned largely by allied forces, defends a complex of dispersed air bases which materially strengthen the effectiveness of our strategic deterrent. If strong and well armed forces hold these perimeter positions, then, in the event of local aggression, our friends, our allies, and we ourselves gain time for reinforcement, and equally important, for political action. These forces in being, give the free world advantages should war come; but more importantly, they represent a major deterrent to aggression and an opportunity through negotiation to avoid war itself. Also, the capacity of these forward allied forces to meet limited attack, as recently demonstrated at Quemoy, provides another and much more acceptable alternative than surrender or resort to atomic war.

The vigorous report of this eminently qualified committee convinces me even more strongly, if possible, than I was before, that the proposals made by the President are the minimum we may adopt with safety to our Nation. The President now has under careful consideration the recommendation of this select committee for an increase this coming fiscal year for appropriations for the military phases of the mutual security program. In view of the evidence, there seems no reasonable doubt that the increase in strength recommended by the committee is needed; and if the President, after careful examination of the recommendations, in the light of his great knowledge, considers that additional appropriations should be made available for fiscal year 1960, I, for one, will rely on his judgment as to timing.

I do not want to see taxes raised. I do not want an increase in the number of inductions of young Americans into the Armed Forces. Therefore, I plan to support in full measure the President's request for military assistance funds. The alternative is a defense budget increased by many times the $1.6 billion he has asked for this purpose, plus a heavier burden of military conscription and other costs of a semimobilized state that cannot be measured in dollars. Let others advocate such onerous alternates, if so minded. I cannot subscribe to it.

ECONOMIC STRENGTH—DEFENSE SUPPORT

Thus far I have spoken primarily of the military strength of our allies. We know that it is inseparable from their economic strength, and I turn now to a discussion of these vital elements of our mutual security program which are directed toward the creation of economic strength in the free world.

Twelve of the nations cooperating with us in collective security provide 3 million armed forces, nearly one-half of the total of the free world. Without exception, these nations form a belt on the southern and eastern boundaries of the Communist bloc. They are prime targets of the Communists. The risk of their geographic positions is heightened by the weakness or strain on the limited resources of their economies caused by their heavy military commitments in the free world interest.

It would be foolhardy indeed to overlook the economic health of these countries—Korea, free China, Vietnam, Iran, Turkey, Greece, Spain, and the others—in our preoccupation with the importance of their military contributions. We do not overlook it. Through economic assistance in the defense support category of the mutual security program, we enable them to maintain these needed forces without endangering their political and economic stability.

The President has asked the Congress to authorize and appropriate $835 million for defense support. I am convinced that this is a most reasonable cost for the tremendous benefit we gain in the strength of our worldwide security position.

The alternative to providing defense support, as the President has requested, and the military contribution it sustains is either a crumbling of free world defenses under Soviet pressure or the direct provision by the United States, at an incalculably higher cost, of the military force to hold the line against the enormous military power of the Communist bloc.

MUTUAL SECURITY AND ECONOMIC PROGRESS

The arguments that spur us to vote for the President's program of military assistance and defense support are so compelling that I wonder why it is necessary to repeat them year after year. We are in effect buying essential military protection at bargain rates. The arguments for economic development aid to our free world partners and other friendly nations may be somewhat more subtle, but are no less compelling. Looking back 10 or 50 years from now, we may speak of the great decision to help underdeveloped nations achieve progress somewhat as we now view the Monroe Doctrine—a policy showing foreknowledge of our long-term interests and with lasting implications for the fabric of our international relations. We have already come to view the Marshall plan in this light.

THE CHALLENGE IN ASIA AND AFRICA

It may well be that 10 or 50 years will see the blossoming of the new nations of Africa and Asia as they burst forth to take their place in the modern world. How will our Nation be looked upon then? Will we be the last surviving remnant of a decadent civilization exposed on every side to a totalitarian host? Or will we be regarded as the mature sister state that, in its wisdom, has shown the way for these new nations to develop in peace and freedom—to its own advantage and their endless profit?

Since World War II, 21 nations, 700 million people, a quarter of the globe, have achieved independence. By far the great majority of the nations has adopted a democratic, representative form of government. This did not come about by accident. The writings and examples of Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln had important influences on the new leaders of these nations. The democratic principles, economic institutions, and material well being that have brought us to world leadership exert a powerful attraction to their peoples in their struggle for true independence and economic progress.

Is it possible that we would ignore these natural bonds between us and the new nations; that we would refuse to heed their urgent cries for economic assistance—capital and skills—and leave a void that can only benefit the Communists?

THE PRICE OF ECONOMIC GROWTH UNDER COMMUNISM

The leaders of the Soviet Union and Communist China see in the impatient demands for progress by these people an historical opportunity. In one hand, they hold out the example of progress under communism—their great leap forward. In the other, they hold out the enticement of economic aid. In 1958 the tempo of the economic offensive increased to $1 billion in aid agreements with free world countries. This includes $175 million for development projects in Egypt plus $100 million for the Aswan Dam, $100 million to Argentina, mostly for petroleum development, $225 million to Indonesia—I may add, parenthetically, that is an amount exactly equal to that which the President has requested for the Development Loan Fund—$120 million to Iraq for arms, $40 million to Ceylon, $41 million to Yemen, and many smaller agreements with other countries.

Let us not underestimate the appeal of the example of progress under the Communist economic system and the magnet of aid offers. We are competing for the hearts and minds of people who will no longer tolerate incomes of less than $100 a year, life expectancies half of our own, and a bleak future for their children. If they do not move forward under moderate leadership within the democratic framework they have chosen, they will be easy prey to Communist agitators in their midst, aggravated by the entanglements of Communist aid. These people are told by Communist propagandists that the Red remedy will cure their economic ills. What it really offers is growth under forced draft, greater sacrifice and misery for people already hungry and ragged; a new form of bondage for people who have just learned freedom.

Our answer to this should be the promise of cooperation between nations, help by the most advanced to the least advanced nations, growth in human dignity and individual liberty. The mutual security program should be our message assuring these people that we want to give them this choice. I have no doubt that they will choose the free world way.

CAPITAL—THE DEVELOPMENT LOAN FUND

Let me examine briefly what the President is asking us to approve for economic development purposes within the total requested for mutual security. First, there is the Development Loan Fund, which symbolizes the shift in policy from grants to aid on a long-term basis with repayment tailored to suit the individual abilities of the borrowing countries. Senators will recall that the President requested $2 billion over a 3-year period when the Development Loan Fund was proposed in 1957. Actually, in the first 2 years of its operation, Congress appropriated a total of $700 million. Implied in congressional action on the President's request was the feeling that the Loan Fund, although arising in part from a recommendation by Congress, was, after all, a new departure and should be operated on a trial basis at first.

The record of the Fund during its first 2 years of operation has been impressive. Nearly $3 billion in firm proposals have been received. Effectively, all the capital available has been committed in sound loans to more than 30 countries. Nearly $1.5 billion of proposals are still under consideration.

There is now before the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate a proposal by the President to provide a supplemental appropriation of $225 million to keep the Loan Fund in business until fiscal year 1960 funds give it new working capital. The proposal will soon come before the whole Senate with the recommendation of the Appropriations Committee. I urge my colleagues on the committee and on the floor to support this key measure. It is a nonpartisan matter. Our action will be watched by our friends and by our adversaries. They will see it as a signal of our intentions, of our determination to be steadfast in our help to new nations in their struggle to provide their people with a decent life.

We are being asked this year, in addition to the supplemental appropriation, to provide additional capital of $700 million for the Fund to be available starting in fiscal year 1960. It seems to me that this is not an excessive amount in view of the record the Fund has established in its first 2 years of operation and when we remember that it is the ultimate source of development capital that the underdeveloped nations have to turn to.

EXPORTING SKILLS

The second item for economic development that we are asked to approve is technical assistance in the amount of $211 million. This program—point 4—has proved its effectiveness over the years. Now, the increasing abilities of the underdeveloped countries to absorb technical assistance more effectively, the improved availability of American technicians, the importance of increasing our help to our Latin American neighbors, and the developing nations of Asia and Africa, have led the President to ask for an increase in funds for this program by fiscal year 1960. I think we should provide this increment in technical cooperation because, within the limit at which this assistance can be absorbed and supplied, it is one of the most efficient—and relatively one of the cheapest—ways that we can stimulate economic progress in the underdeveloped countries.

MEETING SPECIAL NEEDS

The third category of the mutual security program that contributes to economic development is special assistance. The underlying purpose of special assistance is to achieve particular objectives of American foreign policy in the countries we help. It may be illuminating simply to read from a list of these countries to explain the need for this form of aid:

First. Libya: A newly independent nation striving for a viable economy and accepting the burden and risk of a key American airbase on its soil.

Second. Jordan: An impoverished nation under a most courageous leader which is supporting a heavy burden of military forces essential to its survival as an independent nation.

Third. Afghanistan: A nation which must have help from us to avoid total dependence on the Soviets as it fights poverty and backwardness.

Fourth. West Berlin: The symbol of freedom inside the Iron Curtain that must have our support.

Fifth. Morocco: Another newly independent nation struggling for economic progress and on whose territory we have airbases of great value to our own and free world security.

Sixth. Tunisia and Sudan: Countries whose continued independence and freedom of action are in our national interest.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, how much more time does the Senator desire?

Mr. SCOTT. I think 10 additional minutes, or 8 additional minutes, will be sufficient.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes additional to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania is recognized for an additional 10 minutes.

Mr. SCOTT. I thank the Senator from Montana.

FIGHTING DISEASE

I should mention here a new program proposed this year for financing from special assistance funds that could have profound implications for the future health and well-being of the people we seek to help. The success of the malaria eradication program in its third year has brought within sight the virtual removal of this worst of all killers. I have seen this program in action in Nepal and have been greatly impressed. Building on that program we now plan to undertake initial investigations looking toward community water supply programs as a means to conquer waterborne diseases. It will attack on a new front in the war against preventable diseases, a war which can be waged at relatively low cost, which produces immediate economic gains in terms of human output and responds to the Biblical challenge in the second chapter of Genesis.

COST OF MUTUAL SECURITY

The total the President is asking for economic development assistance this year, the Development Loan Fund, technical cooperation, and special assistance, comes to $1.2 billion. What kind of Americans are we if we tell ourselves that we are too poor to set aside from our material consumption this amount that helps to insure our future safety and assures the less advanced peoples that we stand behind them in their struggle for a better life? We are being asked to provide two-fifths of 1 percent of our national income for this purpose, at a time when our standard of living is rising at a rate of 4 percent a year. The President has declared:

> We could be the wealthiest and most mighty Nation and still lose the battle of the world if we do not help our world neighbors protect their freedom and advance their social and economic progress. * * * It is not the goal of the American people that the United States should be the richest Nation in the graveyard of history.

If America's security were unrelated to the fate of Indonesia or Tunisia, if we could safely remain indifferent when economic collapse led to a Communist takeover in Pakistan or India or Iran, if our bases in Spain or Libya were not essential for retaliatory striking power, if Turkey or South Korea could maintain powerful armies in the free world interest without economic support, if our industrial and military production could continue without strategic materials from abroad, then perhaps the objections to the cost of this program might have merit.

The fact is that Communist aggression is not limited to a single weapon or to an unambiguous full scale attack. Communism employs whatever means will advance its ends. The threat of economic penetration is today more immediate and potentially almost as great as the threat of intercontinental missiles. The mutual security program is our shield against the forms of Communist imperialism which cannot be met by direct force. It is our primary defense against subversion and against a shift in the balance of power. It gives hope and confidence to the newly free peoples of the world in our determination to support their progress.

I know there are those who feel that as a Nation we have no moral responsibility for the economic welfare of the rest of the world, or who feel that the problem is so vast and our help relatively so puny that it is a hopeless undertaking.

I deplore the reasoning of those who point to this program as an alternative to domestic spending and demand that we "choose which programs we are for." These are people who would pluck the tailfeathers of the Great Bald Eagle to line the nests of their local pet projects.

We must be above preoccupation merely with post offices, dams, irrigation systems, how tall the corn grows and whether the parity is as high as an elephant's eye. This may be the last time to reflect on the grim and sobering prospect of what will confront us if for lack of an adequate mutual security program, there come a day where there be no post offices or dams or gently-waving corn.

Such attitudes are out of keeping with our national tradition and character. Our Nation stands for the dignity and worth of the individual, for progress in liberty for all of mankind, for moral law. We are firm in the belief that man, unfettered, can triumph over obstacles, however huge, that confront him. By helping others who have learned these concepts from us and who seek to apply them to achieve a better life, we reaffirm our own faith in the principles that brought us the blessings and freedom we enjoy today.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time, and I thank the acting majority leader for his courtesy in yielding to me.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT REPORTING AND DISCLOSURE ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1555) to provide for the reporting and disclosure of certain financial transactions and administrative practices of labor organizations and employers, to prevent abuses in the administration of trusteeships by labor organizations, to provide standards with respect to the election of officers of labor organizations, and for other purposes.

Mr. ERVIN. Mr. President, I yield 45 minutes to the distinguished Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT].

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. President, the Senate is now engaged in a debate on what is likely to be the most important legislation which it will be our privilege to consider during the 86th Congress. No legislation in the past decade has so totally captured the interest and conscientious attention of the American public as has the legislative subject matter currently before this great deliberative body.

Many individuals closely associated and intimately acquainted with labor-management relations in the United States have recognized for a considerable time the essential need for expansion and modification of the Federal statutes dealing with labor-management relations. But it was not until the hearings and investigations conducted by the McClellan rackets committee that the general public became thoroughly acquainted and aware of the widespread corruption and racketeering which exists in the labor-management field. I have served on the McClellan committee since its creation, and I am currently serving as the vice chairman of that committee. I entered my duties as a member of the McClellan committee with complete objectivity and as somewhat of a novitiate in the field of labor relations. I have been profoundly shocked by the disclosures of corruption, violence, union-boss autocracy, and racketeerism which have been made before the McClellan committee.

I daresay there is not a Member of Congress who has not spoken out in disgust against the multitude of evils which have come to light during the more than 24 months of hearings and investigations. We failed dismally in the 85th Congress to enact effective labor reform legislation. The Senate came to bat twice, and in both instances it struck out; so did the House. We failed dismally to do the job required to meet the problems specifically defined and disclosed by our investigation.

We, the Members of Congress, have told our fellow citizens that we are going to do something in the 86th Congress to rid this Nation of the evils disclosed by the McClellan committee. We have announced to our constituents that the 86th Congress will secure the rights and protect the interests of the individual members of America's labor unions. Our people have listened with solemnity to these exhortations of their elected representatives. They have reacted in a manner consistent with our grand American tradition. The citizenry of this Nation has issued a mandate to Congress, commanding us to enact effective labor reform legislation.

No mandate from the public has ever been clearer or more authoritative in its terms. The American public has directed us to enact legislation which will do a thorough job of cleaning up the ugly mess revealed by the rackets committee investigations. The people that we represent do not want legislative circumlocution. They want laws passed in the labor-management field which strike at the fundamental evils in this area. The American public is earneastly desirous of legislation which will in fact curb the dishonest, unethical, and autocratic actions of men like Hoffa, Beck, Maloney, Shefferman, Mazey, and Reuther. Our fellow citizens want legislation which will effectively protect the rights and interests of men like Tom Coffey, Roy Underwood, Desmond Berry, and Peter Batalias. They want no legislative artifices, which merely claim to accomplish these things—they want the "real McCoy" and they want it enacted by the 86th Congress. The American taxpayer has spent well over $1 million in paying the expenses of the McClellan committee investigations. He is entitled to some dividends and some legislative returns on that investment.

Certainly the bill currently before us, S. 1555, does not satisfy the terms of the mandate issued to Congress by the American public. The committee bill is a masterpiece of oversight, expediency, and inadequacy. Its proponents, both senatorial and professorial, extravagantly claim that S. 1555 will put Hoffa out of business. I cannot for the life of me see what provisions in S. 1555 are going to delimit the freewheeling activities of labor leaders like James R. Hoffa, unless it is hoped that Hoffa will somehow be rendered less effective by a severe case of writer's cramp, resulting from the reporting requirements of this bill. I will eagerly wager a South Dakota T-bone steak against a Boston scrod that S. 1555, if enacted, will not even slow down Mr. Hoffa, much less put him out of business. One does not have to be a Boston lawyer, a Cambridge professor, or a Secretary of Labor, to spot the many weaknesses, inadequacies, and omissions of this legislative attempt at labor reform, if it is not materially amended.

Mr. President, I take this opportunity to commend the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. GOLDWATER], the distinguished minority leader [Mr. DIRKSEN], and the minority counsel of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee, Mike Bernstein, for the outstanding statement of minority views which they have prepared on S. 1555. I commend this report to the attention of the country and of all of my colleagues. It is a comprehensive and searching legal analysis of the weaknesses, omissions, and loopholes of the committee bill.

I regret that only 45,000 copies of the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD are published and distributed to American taxpayers. I wish that 45 million copies of the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, recording the debates and the votes on this important measure, were available, so that all our constituents, all members of labor unions, and all interested citizens could have the benefit of reading the debates, evaluating the arguments, monitoring the votes which are cast, and reading the minority views, which so clearly point out the obvious weaknesses in S. 1555, as reported from the committee by a divided vote.

An objective study of the minority report and appendix B cannot fail to convince the reader that S. 1555 simply cannot accomplish the broad reforms, so proudly claimed by its proponents. An objective reading of the minority report indicates with eloquent clarity that S. 1555 is akin to the proverbial "boy sent out to do a man's job."

Mr. President, it is indeed dismaying to me, as the vice chairman of the McClellan investigating committee to note the apparent and substantial disregard by the drafters of S. 1555 of the findings and recommendations made by the McClellan committee, after the expenditure of more than a million dollars of the taxpayers' funds and after more than 24 months of careful deliberations and almost constant hearings and investigative activity.

I am equally dismayed and appalled when I observe the casual recognition given by the majority members of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare to the legislative proposals for labor reform which have been presented by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN] the able and energetic chairman of the Senate rackets committee.

With all due respect to my colleagues in the majority, who serve on the Senate Labor Committee, I doubt that there is any person currently serving in Congress who is better acquainted than is JOHN MCCLELLAN with factual elements of corruption and racketeerism in the labor-management field.

For the past 2 years the Senator from Arkansas has devoted his time and effort unstintingly to directing the vast investigative efforts which have provided the factual foundation for the proposed legislation we are currently considering. As a matter of fact, it is the record of these investigations which bring the proposed legislation before us in the first instance.

Consequently, it is strange, indeed, and it is almost startling, that the majority has not seen fit to use to the fullest measure the counsel and advice of the Senator from Arkansas. I regret that the McClellan recommendations have been ignored in the drafting of S. 1555. I am sure that during the debate the distinguished Senator from Arkansas will participate actively in the full discussion. His observations should be of real value in the formulation of effective labor legislation. I regret that the committee bill was not sufficiently and effectively strengthened in the committee deliberations, so that he would have found it a reflection of his efforts, and not have found it necessary to prepare and submit a substitute, which is now before us, carrying the name of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. President, the proposed legislation which we are being asked by the majority to pass has received the warm endorsement of the overlords of the AFL–CIO. Let us never forget that these are the same men who a year ago told us that organized labor was fully capable of cleaning its own house without any assistance from Congress and without any new legislation.

These are the same men who by the actions of their ethical practices committee apparently continue to tolerate the abuses and corruption so abundantly existent in the International Union of Operating Engineers, for example. These are the same men who have demanded the title VI provisions of S. 1555, weakening rather than strengthening the Taft-Hartley Act, as the "quid pro quo" for their much-sought-after support.

Mr. President, these are the same men who, according to the proponents of S. 1555, will be controlled and regulated in their union-officer capacities by the various provisions of S. 1555.

I am frankly distrustful of labor reform legislation which is endorsed by the very men whose activities it purports to control. I would have been no less distrustful of the effectiveness of the Sherman Antitrust Act had it received the warm endorsement of the big business barons of the 1890's. However, it is not the endorsement of the AFL–CIO officialdom which causes my disenchantment with S. 1555 in its present form.

My reasons for opposing the proposed legislation in its present form stem from the many substantial and obvious weaknesses of S. 1555, when the bill is related to the problem defined by our investigating committee.

It seems to me to be crystal clear that if Congress is to legislate on the basis of the evidence produced by our investigating committee, and is to solve the problems which were disclosed thereby, we should certainly try to eliminate the problems which give birth to the concept of passing labor reform legislation. A careful analysis of S. 1555 convinces me that the bill in its present form fails miserably to meet that challenge.

Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss all the weaknesses and omissions of S. 1555, for I am confident that all the aspects of the majority's failure to report strong and effective labor legislation will be thoroughly aired during the cause of this great debate, and during the consideration of the 50 to 100 amendments which apparently have been or will be offered to the basic bill.

I would, however, like to discuss a few specific aspects of the bill which particularly disturb me, and which I think should be brought to the attention of the Senate and the American people.

Mr. President, I first invite the attention of the Senate to title III of the committee bill. That title deals with union elections. I am particularly interested in the union election provisions, for little progress can be made in setting things right in the house of labor if rank and file members are not allowed the basic American privilege of choosing, in an atmosphere of honesty, secrecy, and fairness, the individuals who will represent their interests in negotiations with management.

I have given serious thought to the implementation of basic safeguards for the voting rights of union members in union elections, so as to safeguard voting rights which our investigating committee clearly has shown are being flagrantly violated in many unions at the present time.

On February 6 of this year I introduced S. 1002, a major portion of which was dedicated to the establishment of procedures which would workably realistically, and effectively safeguard the voting rights of the rank-and-file members of organized labor.

I appeared before the Labor Subcommittee on March 9 of this year and discussed in considerable detail the election provisions of S. 1002. These recommendations were apparently given short shrift by the majority membership of the committee. That would not disturb me if the majority had improved the title III provisions of the Kennedy bill with safeguards of their own. Minor changes have been made, but nothing of substance has been done to improve this important area of the bill. Section 301 of the committee bill is in the main a compound of worthy but totally ineffectual generalities about democracy in union elections. With the exception of 3 or 4 standards established for union elections, I daresay, it would be virtually impossible to violate section 301, as presently found in the committee bill.

Let us look, for example, at the safeguards provided in section 301 for the nomination of candidates. Senate bill 1555 requires that "a reasonable opportunity shall be given for the nomination of candidates." Such broadly phrased requirements are valueless in the event of an election contest, for from an evidentiary standpoint they are not susceptible to the requirements of judicial proof. What, for instance, is "a reasonable opportunity"? I can conceive of a number of sets of factual circumstances which might be determined by a court as reasonable because of the difficulties involved in proving a violation of a general statutory requirement. However, with clearly defined nominating provisions required in the law, these same circumstances could easily be proven to be clearly violative of the statutory standards and to be patently abusive of individual rights.

Let us consider a union of 1,000 members, having a quorum provision allowing official business to be conducted in the presence of 8 members—and such provisions do exist in labor union constitutions today. Or even suppose it is a union having a quorum provision calling for 5 or 10 percent of the membership to be present. The union secretary, representing the incumbent officers, either announces at a union meeting or posts on the union hall bulletin board a notice that nominations will be received at the next union meeting. The incumbent officers then get their cronies together and hold a summary nominating session at the next union meeting. Certainly such practices must be recognized as discriminative, but I doubt that in a court of law such practices could be shown to be less than reasonable under the general provisions of S. 1555. Glittering generalities such as this amount to little more than window dressing, and are utterly worthless so far as securing the rights of the individual members is concerned.

I intend to offer as an amendment at a later point in the debate the nominating procedures contained in S. 1002, which I earlier recommended to the Subcommittee on Labor. The nominating provisions of S. 1002 establish a clearly defined procedure, employing a nomination petition, which must be signed by a minimum of 2 percent of the members in good standing. A specific 60-day period is defined for the filing of nominations with certain dates set forth for the opening and closing of nominations. The secretary of the labor organization is designated to receive the petitions, and he is required to acknowledge the receipt of such petitions by a signed statement provided to the nominee. This latter requirement protects against a dishonest secretary, who might otherwise be tempted to eliminate prospective candidates through destroying their nominating petitions. When one investigates existing union-governing documents, and finds unions with quorum provisions requiring only seven or eight members to conduct official business, the need for uniform and well-defined nominating procedures becomes immediately apparent. I sincerely hope the Senate will act to improve the committee bill in this important area.

I further recommended to the Subcommittee on Labor that the provisions of section I(a) (5) of S. 1002 be incorporated in any labor bill reported by that subcommittee. This subsection of my bill provided for the creation of a membership election committee to be established by the written designation of the various certified candidates for union office. The committee so established would be given full power and authority for the conduct of the election, including the counting of the ballots and the certification of the results. Such a committee would insure every candidate for union office that he would be represented officially during the entire course of the election, especially during the crucial period when the votes were being counted. No "shenanigans" could occur without the victimized candidate being fully advised by his representative, so that he could initiate election contest proceedings.

In brief, my bill provides for candidates for union office precisely the same safeguards which every Member of the U.S. Senate insists upon and enjoys for himself. I see no reason why candidates for office in unions and members of labor unions should not be assured of the same kind of protection for honest elections as both we and our constitutents insist upon in the various States which we represent.

As a further protection my bill specifically prohibits union officers, employees, or candidates from serving on the election committee. This is to safeguard against incidents like those which occurred in the San Francisco local of the Operating Engineers, when Victor Swanson, an incumbent international vice president and candidate for reelection, actively participated in a phony count of union ballots.

Apparently this recommendation of mine must have received at least casual attention from the majority members, for they improved the Kennedy bill slightly by the inclusion at the top of page 36 of the following language:

> Adequate election safeguards to insure a fair count of the ballots shall be provided, including the right of any candidate to have an observer at the polls and at the counting of the ballots.

Once again my friends across the aisle chose to employ the "broad brush" legislative approach to deal with a vital safeguard in union election procedures. Such general provisions are immediately vulnerable to manipulation and contrivance by powerful and dishonest union bosses. The general requirement in S. 1555 accords no official status to the observer at polls and includes no proscription of union officers or candidates from being present and active participants at the counting of the ballots of a union election in which the rank and file members may be attempting to depose a wily operator like Joey Fay or Johnny Dio. I am confident that a majority of the Members of the Senate will see the vital need for greater specificity and definition in legislating safeguards and standards for union officer elections. I intend to offer as an amendment to S. 1555 the election-committee requirements contained in S. 1002.

It seems, Mr. President, that the drafters of title III of S. 1555 were unable to strike a happy medium in their legislative styling of the requirement and standards for union elections. On the one hand, as I have just discussed, title III fails, due to the extreme breadth and overly general nature of some of its requirements. On the other hand, title III has failed to provide adequate protection due to the fact that other of its provisions suffer from too much detail. In these latter cases, the drafters of S. 1555 have used what might be referred to as the "giveth and taketh away" legislative approach. They "giveth" protection to union members in one breath by the inclusion of a necessary prohibition or requirement; then in the next breath they "taketh away" with an ancillary provision, which destroys the effect of the safeguard initially established.

A classic example of the "giveth and taketh away" approach is found in subsection (d) of section 301. At one point in subsection (d) the drafters have provided that not less than 15 days prior to an election, official notification of the election will be mailed to each member at his last-known home address. This is an excellent requirement, and had the drafters been able to restrain themselves and stop right there, everything would have been just fine. But, alas, "the drafter giveth and the drafter taketh away," for then a restrictive proviso was added to exclude notification by mail if the election date is specified in the constitution and bylaws of the labor organization. The elimination of direct notice to union members as to the date, time, and place of elections denies to them a privilege accorded by law to every corporation stockholder in America.

Mr. President, I understand that during the executive consideration of the bill by the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, the able junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY] offered an amendment to strike the aforementioned restrictive proviso. The Senator from Vermont felt as do I that union officials should not be relieved of the responsibility of notifying members as to election dates under any circumstances; however, the Prouty amendment was defeated on a straight party-line vote.

I certainly hope the Senator from Vermont will offer an amendment on the floor of the Senate to the same effect. For I do not think that an amendment providing such a basic American safeguard as election notification should be scuttled by the dark of the moon in the sequestered atmosphere of an executive committee session. I feel that the American public deserves to have this issue discussed on the floor of the Senate in open session, where the position of every elected representative will be clearly delineated.

Let us now look further to another of the "giveth and taketh away" provisions of title III.

I invite the attention of the Senate to subsection (f) of section 301. Initially this subsection prohibits the use of dues or assessment-derived union funds and any employer-derived funds to promote the candidacy of any person seeking union office. This provision might not go far enough, in that it does nothing to restrict indirect raids on the union treasury, as in the case of the UAW flower funds; but at least it would protect against direct raids on the union treasury, and in so doing it is a major step in the right direction. However, once again the ebullient drafters of Senate bill 1555 could not stem their legislative outpourings, and with an additional brief stroke of the legislative stylus they undid all of the good previously done, for in the last three lines of subsection (f) the initial restrictions are hedged by allowing dues-derived and assessment-derived union funds to be used for "factual statements of issues". The inclusion of the four fateful words "factual statements of issues" utterly destroys all of the protection to union members and union funds which were established in the opening lines of subsection (f). So, although the preface is perfect, the provisions of this part of the bill walk backward, instead of forward, from the standpoint of assuring clean democracy in labor unions.

Mr. President, what is the meaning of this nebulous phraseology? Who is to say that a particular campaign brochure or pamphlet is or is not a "factual statement of the issues". Mr. President, all of us in the Senate are knowledgeable and experienced veterans of the political battlefields and arenas. Is there among us one who, in utmost sincerity, thinks that it is realistically or practically possible to present, in the heat and tumult of a campaign, a statement of the issues which is totally objective, without bias or shading to either side? I think experience has taught all of us that total objectivity in an election campaign, be it State, county, municipal or union, is rarely, if ever, attainable.

Some of the most devastating campaign literature I have ever read has been presented in the format of a "factual statement of the issues"; but beneath the "factual" facade one finds a subtly expressed and artistically shaded partisan message. Is not the "factual statement of the issues" technique frequently employed by the political brain-trusters which Walter Reuther has drawn together in his Committee on Political Education? Is that not what we read in C.O.P.E.; as it moves stealthily more and more into the partisan political field? Did not David McDonald successfully campaign for reelection as international president of the Steelworkers Union by making a series of "factual" presentations of the issues involved in the campaign, financed by the dues of the union members, some of whom were endeavoring to elect an opponent who was running for that office?

Mr. President, this innocent appearing language, which has been included in the committee bill, will, if anything, worsen—I repeat, Mr. President, it will worsen—conditions in union elections; it will worsen the situation from the standpoint of protecting the union members against being propagandized by means of the expenditure of their own funds. This language has the effect of giving a congressional license to the use of union funds for campaigning done under the guise of "a factual statement of the issues."

I do not know who is the author of those four words; but I am convinced that unless the Senate eliminates those four words, it will do new damage to the desires of millions of fine American men and women in the trade-union movement who are endeavoring to enjoy the privilege and the practice of self-determination.

I cannot believe that this Congress or any Congress wishes to place itself in the position of granting such a license to union officers. Consequently, I intend to offer an amendment striking these four innocent-appearing words from section 301(f).

I shall now conclude my criticsm of the inadequacies of title III of the committee bill with a brief discussion of one further "giveth and taketh away" provision that is contained in Senate bill 1555. I refer specifically to section 305(a). In this subsection the committee has wisely provided that individuals convicted and imprisoned for an enumerated group of felonies will not be allowed to serve as an officer or executive employee of a labor organization, unless their citizenship rights have been fully restored, or unless the Secretary of Labor, based on an administrative hearing, has determined that the service of such individual in an officer or employee capacity is not contrary to the spirit of this act. Had the drafters of Senate bill 1555 seen fit to have stopped at this point, I would have no quarrel with the provisions of this subsection. I believe that individuals formerly convicted of felonies, who are making an honest and sincere attempt at reform, should be given encouragement by society. I do not believe that these individuals should be permanently deprived of their right to assume a responsible position in society, providing they have the necessary capabilities. I shall be perfectly satisfied to drop the barrier to union office and responsible union employment in the case of those whose conduct since conviction has merited restoration of their citizenship rights. I shall not interpose objection to allowing a convicted felon to serve as a union officer or employee, if he can prove to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Labor that he has reformed and is walking in the paths of righteousness. But the drafters of Senate bill 1555 were not satisfied to lower the bar on the basis of existing State and Federal law or on the basis of an administrative hearing. No, Mr. President; they had to establish an additional, and totally arbitrary, basis for allowing convicted felons to legally assume union office. The committee bill drafters included a little proviso, beginning in line 12, on page 42, which has the effect of removing all the restrictions previously established, if—of all things—the convicted felon has been out of prison for 5 years.

Mr. President, the woods are rather full of convicted felons who have been out of prison for 5 years, and have been in trouble almost incessantly ever since, but, because of skilled lawyers, are able to keep themselves from being put back into the penitentiary, while they drag the determination procedures through the interminable delays of our court system. Mr. President, as the author of the amendment on the floor of the Senate—and let me point out that the amendment was adopted by a yea-and-nay vote and, as I recall, the vote was unanimous, when, a year ago, we added this protection to the Kennedy-Ives bill—I certainly deplore the attempt to sabotage our provision now, by providing that such a person can qualify if he has reformed; in other words, that he can qualify if, for the past 5 years, he has stayed out of jail. We are all too well acquainted with the series of witnesses, the fifth amendment, dark glasses boys, appearing before our committee, who kept out of jail for a long while by ducking and dodging evidence and carrying their appeals to one appellate court after another.

Mr. President, the reformation of men convicted of felonious crime cannot be judged on the basis of some arbitrary chronological yardstick. Some men will start down the road to reform 60 seconds after they have committed the felony; others, unfortunately, may fritter away a lifetime with criminal involvements. Mr. President, I have witnessed the testimony of Joe Fay, Johnny Dio, and other convicted felons, who have appeared before the McClellan rackets committee. Their actions since their departure from prison certainly indicate that their future connection with the labor movement would not be in the best interests of the rank and file members or the general public. I regret that the committee drafters saw fit to place an arbitrary 5-year limitation on the proscription of felons serving in union office or union executive employment, thus, in fact, taking out many of the teeth of the Mundt amendment adopted by the Senate unanimously a year ago. I am unalterably opposed to such an unrealistic limitation, and, at the appropriate time, I shall move to have it stricken from the bill.

Mr. President, before leaving the discussion of union officer elections and democratic procedures in labor organization, I desire to express my disappointment at the failure of the committee bill sponsors to include safeguards for strike authorizations. Second only in importance to leadership selection is the vital determination to strike or not to strike. The right to strike is, indeed, a valuable right of organized labor, and I certainly would not want Congress to legislate in such a way that the effectiveness of this right as a tool of collective bargaining would be in any way diminished. But the right to strike should be exercised with intelligence, and no strike should ever be called, in my opinion, which does not clearly represent the majority judgment of the individuals who will have to participate in it. It seems to me the right to strike should be exercised to advance the best interests of the members of a union, and never simply to advance the interests of a union boss.

Unfortunately, Mr. President, all too many unions do not require a vote of the membership to be taken before the calling of a strike. A study conducted by the Department of Labor in early 1954 indicated that of 112 international-union constitutions analyzed, only 63 contained provisions requiring a strike vote in the locals. This means that 49 international unions, representing nearly 5.8 million members, allowed strike authorizations without a democratic determination by the members affected. The strike determination is the single most important economic decision made by a labor organization, and I do not think such determinations should be arrived at capriciously or arbitrarily by a handful of union leaders and international representatives. They should be arrived at by the men whose families are going to suffer if a strike is unnecessarily called or prolonged, and union members should be given a full and democratic opportunity to participate in such an important economic decision, meaning so much to themselves and to their families.

The opponents of Federal statutes, requiring democratic votes to be taken before a strike is called, continually cite the experience under section 8 of the Smith-Connally Act as proof that prestrike votes are of no material value. It is pointed out by the prestrike vote opponents that in over 96 percent of the cases where votes were taken under the Smith-Connally Act, the members voted to strike in support of their leadership's desires. I do not think the Smith-Connally experience is at all a fair test of the effectiveness of prestrike votes, for a careful reading of that act indicates clearly that the union members were in no way confronted with the contingency of unemployment and loss of pay.

Mr. President, I make this latter contention based on the powers granted the National War Labor Board in section 7 of the Smith-Connally Act and the statutory terms under which these powers were to be invoked. Section 7 granted the power to the National War Labor Board to conduct a hearing on the merits of any labor dispute which the U.S. Conciliation Service certified might lead to substantial interference with the war effort, and could not be settled by collective bargaining or conciliation. Section 7 further granted the Board the power to decide the dispute and provide, by order, the wages, hours, and all other conditions of employment at issue in the dispute. The bill was properly devised so the war effort could proceed unabated, and it is no fair test to relate the experiences of that war effort to what might happen if democratic strike provisions, written into a peacetime measure, could operate.

Certainly, Mr. President, any labor dispute and attendant negotiations which had deteriorated to the point that a strike was imminent would be of the very type and nature which the Conciliation Service would certify to the Board. Once the dispute was before the Board, it would be decided and settled in such a manner as to insure that there would be no work stoppages. I contend, Mr. President, that workers and their leaders were aware of the fact that the Conciliation Service, working in wartime, in conjunction with the War Labor Board, would do everything within the realm of reason to prevent a work stoppage. They knew that they had nothing to lose by voting to strike, for there was virtually no likelihood that such a decision would result in their being "out on the bricks," with the resultant loss of wages. I vigorously contend, therefore, that the prestrike vote experience under the provisions of the Smith-Connally Act is a poorly cited example and deserves little or no recognition, as we relate this problem to the present time operations of our economic system.

I sincerely doubt that there is a rank and file union member in America who would object to Congress legislating so as to guarantee him the full right to participate in a strike determination by democratic secret ballot.

Senate bill 1002, my own labor bill, which I discussed before the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare of the Senate, establishes a formula of democratic procedures for obtaining strike authorizations. I may well determine to offer those provisions from S. 1002 as an amendment to improve and strengthen S. 1555, as the debate on this measure proceeds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from South Dakota has expired.

Mr. MUNDT. May I have 10 additional minutes?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from South Dakota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota is recognized for an additional 10 minutes.

Mr. MUNDT. As the vice chairman of the Senate Rackets Committee, I would be gravely remiss if I did not comment briefly on the failure to include in S. 1555 Taft-Hartley amendments which are germane to the findings of the Rackets Committee. I refer, of course, to amendments tightening the secondary boycott language and prohibiting blackmail picketing. Mr. President, the McClellan committee, in the past 15 to 25 months has conducted extensive hearings on the subject of secondary boycotts and blackmail and stranger picketing. These hearings have made it abundantly clear that these two coercive techniques are the most devastating levers used by corrupt union officials to extort money from small employers and to force employees to join specific unions against their will.

Witness after witness after witness, both from the ranks of labor and management, have said, under oath, that legislation illegalizing blackmail picketing would have prevented the kind of abuses which they were called upon to testify before the committee.

The evidence before the McClellan committee is voluminous and dramatic in support of corrective legislation with respect to secondary boycotts and certain types of coercive picketing. I cannot understand why the sponsors of S. 1555 are reluctant to legislate in this field. They tell us that the inclusion of such Taft-Hartley changes might seriously endanger passage of any labor reform legislation. This statement would seem to beg the question, "Whose support of labor reform legislation will be lost by the inclusion of these Taft-Hartley amendments, which are germane to the McClellan committee investigations?" Certainly the inclusion of such amendments will not cause a loss of support among the minority members in the Senate. Certainly the inclusion of such amendments will not cause a loss of support from the distinguished chairman of the Rackets Committee, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN] who has already introduced bills providing for the needed corrective legislation, and who, during the course of my speech this afternoon, has offered a series of additional amendments to deal with specific deficiencies in the Kennedy-Ervin bill. This would seem to indicate that if passage of labor reform legislation is to be endangered by the inclusion of these two much needed Taft-Hartley amendments that the opposition must necessarily come from among the sponsors of S. 1555. Mr. President, let us not have vagueness and evasiveness on this issue. If there be opponents to these beneficial changes in the Taft-Hartley Act, let them clearly assert their position, and their reasons, instead of skirting the issue with grim predictions that all labor legislation might be lost if these amendments are included.

We are told additionally that amendments to the Taft-Hartley Act should be the subject of further study, and accordingly the leadership of the Labor and Public Welfare Committee has created a blue ribbon panel of experts to study needed changes in the Taft-Hartley Act. Mr. President, all well and good, but if the Taft-Hartley amendments indicated by and related to the McClellan committee investigations are to be subjected to expert examination, why then are not the nongermane amendments contained in title VI of the S. 1555 worthy of further study by these same experts? The reason for this inconsistency of treatment is not entirely clear. The title VI amendments would seem to undercut the work to be done by the blue ribbon panel established by the majority. Perhaps, Mr. President, the exclusion of the title VI amendments, which were in the main requested by the officialdom of the AFL–CIO, would also endanger the passage of any labor reform legislation. I will leave this question to be answered by the majority sponsors of S. 1555.

Mr. President, I shall vote for the Ervin proposal to strike title VI from the bill so that all Taft-Hartley amendments may be considered by the so-called blue ribbon panel of experts. If consistency is to rule, if hypocrisy is to be eliminated, I assume we should place all Taft-Hartley Act amendments in the same category, and I assume the chairman of the Senate Committee on Labor and Education and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY], and their fellow committee members will also vote for the Ervin amendment to strike title VI from the bill so that all Taft-Hartley amendments may be eliminated from this bill, which we should then proceed to perfect and make it a realistic and effective labor-reform bill, for the establishment of democratic rights in labor unions.

However, Mr. President, should the Ervin amendment fail, I shall then support the substitute to title VI to be offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] at a later date, since if we are to include Taft-Hartley amendments in this bill, I much prefer that approach to what is presently included in title VI. In addition, Mr. President, if the Ervin amendment fails, if the Senate decides it desires to include Taft-Hartley amendments in the bill, if the Senate decides the blue ribbon panel of experts can be trusted only with certain categories of amendments and not with others, if we are going to legislate for the whole field, and if we are not going to await the results of the panel findings, then, Mr. President, there are other corrective amendments which may well be proposed and which I shall probably support. However, it remains my conviction that in this measure we should concentrate in evolving legislation which will provide a real bill of rights for union members, which will give them the necessary democratic tools to run their own unions, and which will safeguard honest working men and women and the general public against the type of abuses which have been disclosed by our McClellan investigating committee.

Mr. President, in the consideration of this proposed legislation I devoutly hope the Members of the Senate will assume their full responsibilities as legislators as we vote on amendment after amendment. I hope we shall not see repeated what occurred a year ago, when Senator after Senator stood up to say, "I favor this proposal or that proposal and I think it is a good idea, but I do not want to vote on it now; I want to vote upon it at a later date."

Mr. President, this is the later date. Now is the time. Nobody seriously believes we are going to pass a second labor bill in the present session. I hope we will study, analyze and deliberate on this measure until it has been improved to the greatest possible degree, so that the outcome will be legislation of which every member of the United States can be justifiably proud. Personally, I favor limiting this legislation to the enactment of completely effective labor reform legislation which really corrects the abuses disclosed by our committee and which will give rank-and-file union members the democratic tools and the legislative provisions required to protect their freedoms and to promote their interests. For that reason I shall vote for the Erwin amendment to strike title III from the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from South Dakota has expired.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL AIRPORT ACT

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCCARTHY in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1) to amend the Federal Airport Act in order to extend the time for making grants under the provisions of such act, and for other purposes, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That section 5(a) of the Federal Airport Act, as amended (49 U.S.C. 1104(a)), is amended to read as follows:

Each such authorized amount shall become available for obligation beginning July 1 of the fiscal year for which it is authorized, and shall continue to be so available until so obligated."

SEC. 2. Section 5(b) of the Federal Airport Act, as amended (49 U.S.C. 1104(b)), is amended to read as follows:

"(b) For the purpose of carrying out this Act with respect to projects in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands, there is authorized to be obligated by the execution of grant agreements pursuant to section 12 of this Act the sum of $2,500,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1956, and the sum of $3,000,000 for each of the fiscal years ending June 30, 1957, June 30, 1958, and June 30, 1959, and the sum of $900,000 for each of the fiscal years ending June 30, 1960, June 30, 1961, June 30, 1962, and June 30, 1963. Each such authorized amount shall become available for obligation beginning July 1 of the fiscal year for which it is authorized, and shall continue to be so available until so obligated. Of the sum of $900,000 authorized by this subsection for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1960, and for each of the following fiscal years, the sum of $600,000 shall be available for projects in Puerto Rico and the sum of $300,000 shall be available for projects in the Virgin Islands."

SEC. 3. Section 5 of the Federal Airport Act, as amended (49 U.S.C. 1104), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"ADDITIONAL DISCRETIONARY FUND

"(e) In addition to the sums authorized in subsections (a) and (b) of this section, the Administrator is authorized to obligate in his discretion the sum of $20,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1961, and the sum of $15,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1962, and the sum of $10,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1963, which sums shall be available to pay the United States share of costs of any approved project, and shall be administered as a separate fund without regard to the provisions of section 6 of this Act. Each of the sums authorized to be obligated under this subsection shall become available for obligation beginning July 1 of the fiscal year for which it is so authorized, and shall continue to be so available until so obligated."

SEC. 4. (a) Section 6 of the Federal Airport Act, as amended (49 U.S.C. 1105), is amended as follows:

(1) Strike out the second sentence of subsection (a) and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Each amount so apportioned for a State shall, during the fiscal year for which it was first authorized to be obligated and the fiscal year immediately following, be available only for grants for approved projects located in that State, or sponsored by that State or some public agency thereof but located in an adjoining State, and thereafter any portion of such amount which remains unobligated shall be transferred to and become part of the discretionary fund provided for by subsection (b)."

(2) Strike out subsection (c).

(b) Notwithstanding the amendments made by subsection (a) of this section, if prior to the date of the enactment of this Act a reapportionment was made to a State under section 6(c) of the Federal Airport Act, as heretofore in effect, and the fiscal year for which the reapportionment was made has not expired, any unobligated portion of the amount so reapportioned to such State shall remain available for obligation, only for grants for approved projects located in that State, or sponsored by that State or some public agency thereof but located in an adjoining State, until the end of such fiscal year, but any portion of such amount which still remains unobligated at the expiration of such fiscal year shall be transferred to and become a part of the discretionary fund provided for by section 6(b) of such Act.

SEC. 5. Section 10 of the Federal Airport Act, as amended (49 U.S.C. 1109), is amended by inserting immediately after subsection (c) the following new subsection:

"FACILITIES USED FOR UNITED STATES ACTIVITIES

"(d) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, to the extent that the project costs of an approved project represent the costs of constructing, altering, or repairing that portion of any airport building required to house air traffic control activities, weather reporting activities, communications activities related to air traffic control, or any other activity of the United States with respect to which the Administrator determines that it is in the best interest of the Government to provide facilities therefor, the United States share shall be not to exceed 100 per centum of the allowable costs of such facilities. The United States share shall not include any amount attributable to the cost of constructing, altering, or repairing any other portion of an airport building, or any amount attributable to that part of a project intended for use as a passenger automobile parking facility."

SEC. 6. Section 4 of the Federal Airport Act, as amended (49 U.S.C. 1103), is amended by inserting "(a)" after "SEC. 4." and by adding a subsection to read as follows:

"(b) It shall be the duty of the Administrator to make public by January 1 of each year the proposed program of airport development intended to be undertaken during the fiscal year next ensuing."

(1) In paragraph (7), strike out "the Territory of Alaska, the Territory of Hawaii, or Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands" and insert "Puerto Rico, or the Virgin Islands".

(2) Amend paragraph (12) to read as follows:

"(12) 'State' means a State of the United States, the District of Columbia, or the Territory of Hawaii."

(b) Section 3(a) of such Act, as amended (49 U.S.C. 1102(a)), is amended as follows:

(1) Strike out "the Territory of Alaska and".

(2) Amend the subsection heading to read as follows: "Projects in the Virgin Islands".

SEC. 8. The amendments made by this Act shall not apply with respect to projects for which amounts have been obligated by the execution of grant agreements before July 1, 1959, or the date of the enactment of this Act, whichever is the later date, and, with respect to such projects, the Federal Airport Act shall continue to apply as if this Act had not been enacted.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House, ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. MONRONEY, Mr. SMATHERS, Mr. SCHOEPPEL, and Mr. COTTON conferees on the part of the Senate.

STUDY OF DEVELOPMENT AND COORDINATION OF WATER RESOURCES

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I understand there are no other speakers who desire to address the Senate at this time. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 178, Senate Resolution 48, and that the time consumed be not charged to either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A resolution (S. Res. 48) establishing a committee to study the matter of the development and coordination of water resources.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution (S. Res. 48) establishing a committee to study the matter of the development and coordination of water resources, which had been reported from the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs with amendments, and subsequently reported from the Committee on Rules and Administration with additional amendments.

The amendments of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs were:

On page 2, line 1, after the word "a", to insert "select"; on page 3, line 7, after the name "Works", to strike out "and"; in line 9, after the name "Commerce", to insert "and two members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry; all said members to be designated by the chairmen of the respective committees. The committee shall be designated 'The Senate Interim Select Committee on National Water Resources'."; after line 21, to insert:

(d) The chairman shall be chosen by the members at the first meeting.

On page 4, line 13, after the word "evaporation", to insert "and evapotranspiration"; on page 5, line 3, after the word "purpose", to insert a colon and "Provided, however, That no such contract shall become effective until submitted to the members of the special committee and approved by a majority vote thereof."; in line 12, after "January 31,", to strike out "1961" and insert "1960"; in line 15, after the word "exceed", to insert "$175,000"; and, in line 17, after the word "committee", to strike out "The chairman may designate one or more members who may act for him for the purpose of this resolution."

The additional amendments of the Committee on Rules and Administration were:

On page 3, at the beginning of line 8, to strike out "two" and insert "three"; in line 9, after the word "and", in the amendment of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, to strike out "two" and insert "three"; in line 11, after the word "committees", in the amendment of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, to insert a comma and "at least one member designated from each of the above committees being selected from the minority membership thereof"; at the beginning of line 15, in the amendment of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, to strike out "Interim"; and, in line 20, after "(c)", to strike out "five" and insert "six" so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That there shall be established a select committee which shall make exhaustive studies of the extent to which water resources activities in the United States are related to the national interest, and the extent and character of water resource activities, both governmental and nongovernmental, that can be expected to be required to provide the quantity and quality of water for use by the population, agriculture, and industry between the present time and 1980, along with suitable provision for related recreational and fish and wildlife values, to the end that such studies and the recommendations based thereon may be available to the Senate in considering water resources policies for the future.

SEC. 2. (a) The committee shall be composed of three members of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, three members of the Committee on Public Works, three members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and three members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry; all said members to be designated by the chairmen of the respective committees, at least one member designated from each of the above committees being selected from the minority membership thereof. The committee shall be designated "The Senate Select Committee on National Water Resources".

(b) Any vacancy in the membership of the committee shall not affect its powers, and any vacancy in the membership of the committee shall be filled in the same manner as provided for determining the original membership.

(c) Six members of the committee shall constitute a quorum.

(d) The chairman shall be chosen by the members at the first meeting.

SEC. 3. The committee shall, without limiting the scope of the study hereby authorized, direct its attention to the following matters:

(a) The character and extent of water resources projects that will be needed to be in operation between the present time and 1980 in order to supply the water use requirements of population, agriculture, and industry, including but not limited to navigation development and hydroelectric power generation, and with appropriate provision for flood control, and the realization of recreational and wildlife values.

(b) The character of legislation that may encourage the adoption of new technical methods and improved process for increasing the usefulness of available water resources, including but not limited to weather modification, evaporation and evapo-transpiration reduction, desalination of saline and brackish waters, seepage control, waste-water salvage, and the application of nuclear energy.

SEC. 4. The committee shall transmit to the Senate not later than January 31, 1961, the results of the study herein authorized together with such recommendations as may at that time be found desirable.

SEC. 5. In the conduct of this study full use shall be made of the experience, knowledge, and advice of private organizations, schools, institutions, and individuals. The committee may divide the work among such groups and institutions as it may deem appropriate and may enter into contracts for this purpose: Provided, however, That no such contract shall become effective until submitted to the members of the special committee and approved by a majority vote thereof. Full use shall be made of studies and plans prepared by executive agencies, and such agencies are requested to give the committee or any of its authorized study groups or consultants such assistance as may be required.

SEC. 6. (a) For the purpose of this resolution, the committee is authorized to employ on a temporary basis through January 31, 1960, such technical, clerical, or other assistants, experts, and consultants as it deems desirable. The expenses of the committee under this resolution, which shall not exceed $175,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

(b) For the purposes of this resolution, the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, so sit and act at such places and times, to require, by subpena or otherwise, the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, to procure such printing and binding, and to make such expenditures as it deems desirable. The committee shall cease to exist at the close of business on January 31, 1961.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, Senate Resolution 48 establishes a Select Committee on National Water Resources. Favorable reports on the resolution with perfecting amendments have been made by the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and by the Committee on Rules and Administration. No objection has been expressed to the resolution as amended and a considerable number of Senators have spoken in support of it.

The work which is to be done by this temporary committee is of vital importance to the entire Nation. In the West, almost from the time of first settlement, we have recognized that adequate supplies of water are indispensable for satistory livelihood. As the Western States have matured, their population has progressively increased, cities and communities have grown, and the economy has diversified from its beginnings of a thinly settled livestock and grain economy. This growth has brought prosperity, but we have learned that it also has greatly intensified dependence on water supplies. Many western communities know that the next two decades will be a time of crisis for them—a time for decision whether they are to continue to grow in population and prosperity or whether the shortage of water will create an impassable barrier to the future. In the next two decades western communities must find how they can develop their full potential within the narrow limits of the water supplies available to them.

Dependence on water supplies is now recognized as nationwide. From every section of the United States, we receive requests for consideration of their water problems, many of which are similar to the long-standing western problem of inadequate water supplies. Many of the problems arise from degraded water quality, with pollution by industrial wastes as a major cause. At the same time, floods still are an annually recurring disaster; demonstrating the extent of flood-control work which remains to be done. In the field of navigation, we recognize that we are far behind modern requirements, and far behind the economic transportation requirements of the inland areas.

Solutions to these problems which are brought to us in Congress and urged upon us in person as we travel about the country, are vital to the welfare of virtually every community throughout the United States. The solution to these problems is essential to the maintenance of the living standards which characterize America. In truth, the solution to these widespread water problems is essential to the maintenance of the high levels of industrial production needed for economic strength and national security.

Because of the basic importance of these water problems, Congress must, of course, respond to the needs as they arise. We cannot afford to let any area run short of the water which it needs for its full development.

But immediately, in the Congress, in each of the States, and in virtually every community, questions arise as to how much water is needed, what projects will be required to supply it, and how much will they cost? From available data, it is clear that the requirements for water will greatly increase between now and 1980. Estimates by technical experts place this increase at somewhere between 50 and 250 percent more water than is now used. It seems probable that even such great increases can be supplied, but only by very careful and thorough coordination of the uses and the engineering plans.

It is clear also that in order to supply the amounts of water, of acceptable quality, by the time they will be needed many of the water development programs must be started soon.

It is important, too, that adequate attention be given, at all stages of these programs, to recreation and fish and wildlife needs. These activities depend on water just as much as does industry, and they daily are becoming more important in the life of our people.

Senate resolution 48 will bring together the basic information on what is needed in the field of water resources. It will provide for securing the thinking of technical experts and qualified laymen as to the best ways to proceed. The select committee will report on these matters by January 1961, and it will submit to the Senate its recommendations on them.

Mr. President, I feel that I need hardly urge the importance of this task. I do urge that the Senate agree to the resolution so that the select committee can make a prompt start on the large and important task assigned to it.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I congratulate the distinguished Senator from Montana for having submitted this resolution. I thank my colleagues on the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs for having unanimously reported it.

We in the West have grown up with the knowledge that water is valuable. To us in the West water is as precious as gold. It has been only in recent years that residents of New York City, for example, have become aware of the keen shortage of water which they face. It has been only in recent years that Senators from Eastern States have shown any interest in reclamation. It will be recalled that in the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, during the discussion of the Small Projects Act, many Senators from Eastern States who never before had expressed interest in reclamation suddenly realized that there is a shortage of water for farming and domestic purposes, in the East as well as in the Middle West. So we westerners no longer are the only ones who know what drought means. We are not the only ones who know what dry rivers look like. We are not the only ones who know about depleted lakes and springs. We are now joined by people from all over the United States.

I conclude my remarks, now that the distinguished Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] has arrived, by saying that I hope the work of the committee will proceed immediately, and that it will be productive. It is becoming more and more apparent to those of us in the West that this is a problem of the entire Nation, to be solved by a nationwide effort.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Arizona, who has always been a friend to the conservation and development of water supplies. People living in the semiarid areas are now showing friendship for those who live outside those areas, because of the great need inherent in this problem.

I am happy to see the distinguished majority leader [Mr. JOHNSON] in the Chamber. He has contributed a great deal to this particular proposal.

I note also the presence of the distinguished minority leader [Mr. DIRKSEN], who, as the result of a trip to Montana some years ago when we were both in the House of Representatives, became interested in the problems of reclamation in the semiarid States, and has been a consistent friend ever since.

I am also glad to see present the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. JAVITS]. Not so many years ago, as the Senator from Arizona has pointed out, there was a shortage of water in the Croton Reservoir, I believe, supplying New York City. I bring that subject to the attention of the Senate to show that this is not solely a western problem. It is a nationwide problem; and unless we get busy on it very soon it will be difficult to meet, and we shall be faced with difficulties which will be very expensive to overcome.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I commend and congratulate my distinguished friend the majority whip for bringing this resolution to the floor of the Senate.

I participated in a meeting with the Senators from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD and Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], and a number of other Western Senators, at which time this resolution was originally considered. As the record will show it is their leadership along with the active support of a number of other Western Senators which provided us with this vehicle for examining America's water resources problems now and for the years to come. The list of those who have lent their support to this resolution is long, but I should like to commend particularly the National Reclamation Association, which under the guidance of its president, my good friend, Guy C. Jackson, of Anahuac, Tex., was particularly active in behalf of this resolution before the Senate Interior Committee.

The Nation in recent years has become more and more aware that the conservation, control, and development of water resources is a matter of critical national concern. I may say that we in the Southwest have known this for some time. Only recently a prolonged and devastating drought has ended in Texas. Now we see reports that the Northern Plains States are suffering from a severe shortage of water. Even in many parts of the humid East the critical nature of the problem is now recognized. While water conservation used to be considered to be almost exclusively a Western problem, the critical line has moved progressively east from the 98th meridian until now the problem is clearly one of nationwide significance.

Although this is a nationwide problem, we have not brought our full abilities to bear on its solution. And we are going to have to do just that. The most conservative estimate we have tells us that by 1980 our expanding population and industry will require at least a 50-percent increase in available water supplies.

How are we going to secure this increase? How can we best undertake a general offensive in this area? What are the relative responsibilities of the States, the National Government, and private enterprise? What are the proper roles of each of the various governmental agencies? A report of this committee should give us and the States we represent in the Senate valuable guidance in resolving these important policy questions.

I believe that the adoption of this resolution today will be one of the most constructive things the Senate has done this year. I am happy that the committee unanimously reported the resolution. I believe the Senate will unanimously agree to it.

Again I commend my friend the Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD] for the constructive contribution he has made in the solution of the water problem.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I thank my friend from Texas.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point a statement by the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. Moss] on Senate Resolution 48.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR MOSS

I desire to endorse and support Senate Resolution 48, to establish a Select Committee on Water Resources. The studies and recommendations to be provided pursuant to the resolution are, I am convinced, essential to proper fullfilment of the responsibilities of the Senate, and they are basic to providing for the welfare of the Nation and its economic development and security.

First, I wish to commend the sponsor of the resolution, the distinguished junior Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD] and the cosponsor, his distinguished senior colleague [Mr. MURRAY]. Their leadership in formulating the resolution and in bringing before the Senate a practical and effective method for dealing with water problems is an outstanding service. As I shall mention in a moment, this is extremely valuable to my own State of Utah, as well as to all our neighboring States in the West.

An able report (S. Rept. No. 145) on the resolution was presented to the Senate by the distinguished junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] on behalf of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, on which I am privileged to serve. I fully subscribe to that report, and I commend the junior Senator from New Mexico for the clear and concise statement of the need for the studies and recommendations. That report makes three points very clear:

1. Expanding population, agriculture, and industry will require in the next 20 years use of water somewhere between 50 and 250 percent more than present use.

2. Right now, most of the water that is immediately available and inexpensive is already in use; this means that these increased uses will have to be supplied through programs for maximum conservation, development, and coordination of existing resources, plus a bold approach to new methods such as desalting brackish waters and evaporation reduction.

3. Such water programs must be undertaken well in advance of the time when the water will be needed, because it takes 10 to 15 years or longer to bring such programs into production. That means that many of these projects should be started soon in order to meet the 1980 requirements.

This hits right to the heart of the problems of my home State. Utah is a rapidly growing State. Our population in 1950 was about 690,000, and according to the conservative estimates of the Stanford Research Institute, by 1975 the population will be about 1¼ million—an 80-percent increase. Of course, we in Utah welcome this growth. It is, in a sense, peopling the desert to which our forebears dedicated themselves when they emigrated to Deseret 100 years ago. This growth results from our prospering economy, and, in turn, this growth generates further prosperity.

But while we welcome and rejoice in these prospects of Utah's growth, we also are alarmed. People, and the agriculture and industries that support them, must have water. More people means more water. Do we have the water to match the growing population and industry of our State of Utah? Will we be able to provide the increase in Utah water supplies to match the 80 percent increase in population?

Let me say here that I am confident that Utah will find ways in which to meet its water supply problems. After all, that is the history of Utah since the pioneers descended Emigration Canyon and diverted City Creek for the irrigation of their potato planting. But although I am confident that we will solve our water supply problem, I also am alarmed at the tremendous size of the task, and the closeness of 1975 and 1980 when population is expected to be almost double the present.

This, it seems to me, is perhaps the greatest challenge that we face today, and it is one for which we must immediately marshal all our abilities and resources. For this reason, I say again that the facts and recommendations of the Select Committee on Water Resources will present are valuable and vital to my State of Utah.

I have spoken of Utah because I know that State, and because it is close to my heart. But Utah is just an example of each of the 50 States of the Nation. Each of them, though in varying ways, faces water supply crises in the coming years. In some States, the approaching crisis is like Utah's—short water supplies. Other States face appalling problems of water pollution—water supplies rendered unfit for human or even industrial use because of accumulating contamination. Other areas still are subject to devastating floods, and, as one counts the roster of the States, so one enumerates problems that must be solved—and solved soon—to keep us with our growing country.

How must we, as a nation, go about this? What part will best be done by individual private citizens and local communities, what part will best be done by the States? What part must be undertaken by the Federal Government? How much will be the cost of these necessary measures? Can we afford such expenditures? Let me say here that I believe that as a nation we cannot afford to run short of water, and that we must find ways by which to provide needed water projects, and to meet the costs involved.

These grave problems are brought to focus by means of Senate Resolution 48. This will help us in the Senate, and equally it will help the people and the officials in our home States by supplying the best information that is available.

I urge the prompt adoption of Senate Resolution 48, and I commend the sponsors and the able junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] who has submitted the excellent report on the resolution.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Sometimes we get the strange idea that water is only a western problem. If anyone takes the trouble to visit the Middle West, in the river basins themselves, and discover how many communities have run out of water, and what an amazing recession there has been in the water supply in the heartland of the country, he will discover that we have an abiding interest in the question, no less than that of the Western States.

I commend the distinguished Senator from Montana for the action contemplated in the resolution.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I thank the Senator.

Mr MANSFIELD subsequently said: Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that prior to the agreement to Senate Resolution 48, there be printed in the RECORD excerpts from the report issued by the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and its subcommittee under the chairmanship of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON], and also from the report issued by the Committee on Rules and Administration, under the chairmanship of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS].

There being no objection, the excerpts from the reports were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PURPOSE OF THE RESOLUTION

The purpose of the resolution is to provide the Senate with factual analyses and objective recommendations that it can use in taking legislative action on water resource programs.

Water resource problem

Throughout the country, there is grave concern regarding the adequacy of the Nation's water resources in relation to prospective requirements. This concern arises from recognition that water use will increase greatly during the next 20 years because of the rapidly expanding population, along with even greater expansion of industrial and agricultural production.

Adequate supplies of water of suitable quality are essential to maintain desirable living conditions and necessary levels of industrial and agricultural production. Water is essential for human consumption and community uses. Agriculture, especially irrigation farming, is equally dependent on having large quantities of water for crop production, and industry now uses about as much water as does irrigation agriculture. Industrial uses of water include its direct incorporation in the industrial product, and also many indirect uses such as cooling and washing, and the production of boiler steam. Stored and flowing water is, of course, the basis of other essential elements of the economy such as hydroelectric power generation and navigation. Likewise, increasing public participation in recreation and wildlife activities calls for consideration of the dependence on water for public enjoyment of these resources.

Water for these many uses often is taken for granted, and generally little thought is given to how great is our dependence on water for every activity of daily life. However, occasional catastrophes such as sustained droughts provide sharp warnings that water supplies are not available automatically, and that careful and thorough advance preparations must be made to assure enough water when it is needed. In recent years, several of the large metropolitan areas have experienced water shortages during which the residents were on limited water rations, and the industries were tightly restricted in water use. Along with these dramatic incidents, even more alarming warnings come from the widespread lowering of ground water levels in virtually every section of the country. This is the danger sign that water use is out of balance wtih the annual water income.

Increased use of water in the coming years is a certainty, and it is certain also that the increase will be very large. Two principal factors cause this, one factor being the increase in population, the other factor being increase in average water use per person. Estimates of future population and future per capita water use vary within rather wide limits, but all of them confirm the gravity of the problem. A conservative estimate of the water required by 1980 is based on an assumed population of about 210 million and only moderate increase in per capita use, but even this estimate calls for a 50-percent increase in the water supplies available. Other estimates by highly qualified experts indicate that by 1980 the increase in water requirements may be in the order of 250 percent.

Will there be enough water to meet these requirements? The Chief Hydrologist of the Geographical Survey has said: "As matters stand now, most water that is immediately available and inexpensive to use at each individual point is in use already." This means that the additional water required to supply the increased uses will have to be provided through conservation and development of water resources, and through improved coordination of the prospective uses.

There are many opportunities for increasing the supplies of water for the increased future uses. Substantial increase of water uses can be provided through conservation by means of storage and regulation of flows, and through other works for river regulation. There are also several challenging opportunities to expand the amounts of the usable supplies by new technologies for desalinization of brackish and saline waters, reduction of losses due to evaporation and evapotranspiration, seepage control, wastewater salvage, and similar applications of recent technical advances.

Such water development programs, however, must be undertaken far in advance of the requirements for the water. Even relatively small water projects take 10 to 15 years for planning and construction, and most projects that would provide substantial quantities of water take correspondingly longer time. This indicates that the projects and other measures needed to meet the 1980 requirements for water should be started in the very near future.

NEEDED INFORMATION

Water resource matters have been considered by the Senate since its resolution in the Ninth Congress calling for a program of improvement of the internal waterways. Consistently since that time, the Congress has taken the initiative in recognizing and responding to the water needs of the Nation and of local communities. By 1825, Congress established a general policy of Federal improvement of rivers and harbors, and this policy was perfected and enlarged in the succeeding years. An important milestone was the Reclamation Act of 1902, and another one was the Flood Control Act of 1917 which was further perfected by the Flood Control Act of 1936. A program for control of stream pollution, similarly, has developed pursuant to the congressional authorizations beginning with the 1937 act and perfected in the 1948 act.

While it thus is clear that the Congress recognizes and responds to water resource problems, the rapid upward spiral of water needs multiplies the water problems that confront the Congress. Increases in water requirements of the magnitude that are now in prospect will involve significantly increased costs, and often may involve choice among alternative plans that have markedly different costs and benefits. For these reasons, almost every water matter that is before the Congress raises such questions as:

"How much water development is needed?" and

"What level of water development costs is justified?"

Since 1949, four Presidential commissions and an advisory committee of Cabinet members have made major studies of water resource problems. The reports of these studies have been forwarded to the Congress and they provide much useful information. These reports, however, have not been accompanied by legislative recommendations of the President, and no proposals based on these studies of water resource problems have been transmitted to the Congress in a form that could be considered for legislative action.

Four resolutions of the Senate (S. Res. 84–281, S. Res. 85–148, S. Res. 85–248, and S. Res. 85–299) express its concern for full conservation, development, and utilization of the Nation's land and water resources, and they call for programs commensurate with national requirements.

The factual analyses to be secured by this resolution will provide the basis for determining what programs and other measures, both public and private, are requisite to assure that available water resources will meet requirements between now and 1980. This factual material will relate water requirements to anticipated levels of population and production increases, and will outline in general terms the scope and character of public and private activities needed to fulfill those requirements.

Coordinated approach

The various uses of water are interrelated. In any area, the uses for municipalities, agriculture, navigation, hydroelectric power generation, pollution abatement, recreation, and many other potential uses of the same stream may be complementary or they may be competitive. Because of this interrelation of water uses, it is necessary in any examination of future water requirements to consider water use in its entirety.

Conservation and development activities are similarly interrelated. For example, the operations of storage reservoirs, conveyance channels, ground water pumping, and watershed treatments affect each other. Pollution, both organic and inorganic, is becoming a major problem in many areas, and withdrawals, discharges, and impoundments have important relations to water quality. These facts emphasize the need for coordinated examination of water resource program goals.

WATER RESOURCES COMMITTEE

The subject matter of the needed analyses falls within the jurisdiction of four standing committees of the Senate. These are the Committees on Interior and Insular Affairs, on Public Works, on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and on Agriculture and Forestry. In order to secure comprehensive and coordinated examination, the resolution provides for a temporary special committee to be composed of members of those four standing committees to be designated by their respective chairmen. This select committee will be of limited duration terminating on January 31, 1961, by which time it is to report its findings and recommendations. Being a study committee, it would not, of course, impinge on the legislative functions and responsibilities of the standing committees whose jurisdiction under rule XXV is unaffected.

Committee program

The resolution calls for recommendations based on studies regarding:

(a) The character and extent of water resource programs that will be needed between now and 1980; and

(b) The character of legislation that will encourage new methods for increasing water supplies.

In order to be useful to the Senate, the committee's report should respond specifically and factually to questions about water resource programs such as:

(1) How much water development is needed?

(2) When is it needed?

(3) Where is it needed?

(4) What should be the pattern of water development?

(5) What levels of cost and expenditures are justifiable for future water development?

The resolution provides less than 2 years in which the select committee is to prepare its report on these and equally difficult questions. This is an extremely short time in view of the complexity of the subject and the great number of important issues that are involved. Fortunately, however, for a good many years Federal and State technical agencies have assembled the basic technical data on water resources and water uses. During the first year of its operation, the select committee should, therefore, be able to compile those facts in relation to the questions it will consider.

Two important gaps will need to be filled before this material will be useful in formulating the committee recommendations:

(1) It will be necessary to develop guides as to what amounts of water will be required in relation to various levels of population and economic activity. Stated in time periods and by geographic areas, these requirements will indicate the goals of water resource development programs.

(2) The second gap to be filled is to provide guides as to the economic limits for water development—that is, what costs per acre-foot are economically justified for water for various uses, and how much expenditure of public and private funds can be economically justified for water programs.

Another phase of the committee's program under this resolution will be concerned with new methods for development of water supplies. This is the phase of the study that has to do with desalinization, evaporation reduction, induced precipitation, and like processes. In this field, the committee should bring together the judgment of competent technical experts regarding the possibilities of the various new methods and, to the extent possible, estimates should be sought of the probable amounts of water yield and the probable cost ranges of the various methods. The views and experience of technical and industrial experts should be analyzed to bring out any suggestions regarding legislative means for encouraging new methods for water resource development.

Fund requirements

Because of the diversity of specialized technical material that will have to be analyzed for consideration by the committee, and also because of its temporary character, the needed factual and analytical studies can probably be secured best by placing principal reliance on existing technical organizations rather than by employment of a large committee staff. To this end, the resolution provides that the committee shall make full use of private organizations, schools, institutions, and individuals, as well as the studies and plans of Federal and State agencies. In addition to securing the cooperation of the agencies of the executive branch, the committee should seek to avail itself of the knowledge and information about water resources and water problems that each of the States develops through appropriate State officials. In addition, it is expected that the committee will utilize research contracts with State colleges and universities, and the research institutions, and that the major share of the funds requested will be used on such contracts. A limited number of leading authorities in the field of water resources should be available from time to time for consultation and roundtable discussions.

On this basis, it is anticipated that the committee will require only a very small professional staff of two or three persons to coordinate and interpret the research for the committee.

Other committee expenses relate mainly to the conduct of hearings in Washington and in the field. These hearings will be for the purpose of securing informed public expression regarding the substantive content of the factual analyses as they become available. Consideration by the committee of such public expression will aid it in the formulation of its report and recommendations.

Funds required for these purposes are estimated to be $175,000 for the period ending January 31, 1960. In accordance with the rules, this amount includes the full costs of study contracts that will extend beyond that date, all of which must be authorized before such contracts can be executed.

According to present information, only a much smaller amount is expected to be required for the final 12-month period of the committee's work.

HEARING ON THE RESOLUTION

A hearing on the resolution was held before the Subcommittee on Irrigation and Reclamation on March 17, 1959. Witnesses in support of the resolution included the sponsors, the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD], and the cosponsor, the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY]. Other Senators also appeared in support of the resolution, as did also the representative of the National Reclamation Association. The record of the hearing has been printed.

OBJECTIVES OF THE PROPOSED STUDY

It is believed that the results and recommendations reached by the select committee will be of considerable assistance to the Senate in determining future water resources policies. The factual analyses and conclusions can guide legislative action on future water resources programs.

Additional information relative to the proposed investigation is contained in letters to Senator THOMAS C. HENNINGS, JR., chairman, Committee on Rules and Administration, from Senator JAMES E. MURRAY, chairman, Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and letters transmitted by him from Senator CLINTON P. ANDERSON and Senator Senator GALE W. MCGEE, which letters and accompanying budget are as follows:

U.S. SENATE, COMMITTEE ON INTERIOR AND INSULAR AFFAIRS,
March 24, 1959.

Hon. THOMAS C. HENNINGS, Jr.,
Chairman, Committee on Rules and Administration, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: At its meeting on March 24, 1959, the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs voted to report to the Senate, Senate Resolution 48, to establish a select committee on water resources. As approved by the committee, Senate Resolution 48 authorizes the expenditure of $175,000 for the work of the select committee.

In the attached letter, Senator ANDERSON, chairman of the Subcommittee on Irrigation and Reclamation, sets forth the purpose of the anticipated expenditures along with the budget details tabulated in the customary form. Senator ANDERSON'S letter is fully supported by the action of this committee, and I recommend that your committee act on it favorably. Because of the limited time available to the committee in relation to the large and complex task assigned to it, I hope that an early report by your committee will make it possible for the select committee to start on this soon

Sincerely yours,

JAMES E. MURRAY,
Chairman.

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON INTERIOR AND INSULAR AFFAIRS,
March 24, 1959.

Hon. JAMES E. MURRAY,
Chairman, Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: At its meeting on March 24, 1959, the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs voted to report to the Senate, Senate Resolution 48, to establish a select committee on water resources. As approved by the committee, Senate Resolution 48 authorizes the expenditure of $175,000 for the work of the select committee to January 31, 1960. As requested by the Committee on Rules and Administration, this letter briefly explains the purpose of the anticipated expenditures together with the budget details in the standard form of tabulation. I recommend that this letter be transmitted to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

As stated in Senate Resolution 48, the purpose of the work on the Committee on Water Resources is to provide information and recommendations to the Senate relative to water resource programs. Throughout the country there is grave concern regarding the adequacy of the Nation's water resources in relation to prospective requirements. This concern arises from recognition that water uses will increase greatly during the next 20 years because of the rapidly expanding population along with even greater expansion of industrial and agricultural production.

The gravity of the water resources situation is brought to focus by the fact that at the present time most of the water that is available and inexpensive to use is in use already. The next 20 years' national growth will, however, require increases in water uses estimated to be from 50 percent to 250 percent greater than present uses.

Significant or persistent water shortages would severely retard national growth by limiting economic production, and it might also endanger living standards and health conditions. This is because supplies of water of suitable quality are essential for every phase of the economy. They are essential for human and community uses, for agriculture, especially irrigation farming, and in about equal volume for the many direct and indirect industrial uses. Maintenance of water resources, is of course, vital to navigation and hydroelectric power generation that have such important functions in almost every section of this country. Adequate water supplies are indispensable for most forms of wildlife and recreational activities in which there is increasing public participation.

Water for these many uses is often taken for granted, but drought years and falling groundwater levels give us sharp warning that water supplies are not available automatically. Thorough advance preparations must be made to assure that there will be enough water of acceptable quality when it is needed. We know from experience that such advance preparations take 10 to 15 years for even relatively small projects. Much longer time is required to develop the larger projects to supply any substantial increase in usable water. This indicates that the projects and other measures needed to meet the 1980 water requirements should be started in the very near future.

There are many opportunities for increasing supplies of usable water. It can be accomplished by further storage of streamflows and other works for river regulation. There are also challenging opportunities in the application of new technologies for desalinization of saline and brackish waters, reduction of evaporation losses, induced precipitation, seepage control, waste-water salvage and similar methods.

Increases in water requirements of the magnitude that are in prospect will involve significantly increased costs, and often they may involve the choice among alternative plans with markedly different costs and benefits. For these reasons, although the Congress consistently has recognized and responded to water needs of the Nation and of local communities, it is now confronted with questions as to how much water development is needed and what level of costs is justified.

Four Presidential commissions and a committee of Cabinet members have made major studies of water resource problems since 1949. The reports of these studies provide much useful information, but they have not been in a form for legislative action, and they have not been accompanied by any legislative recommendations of the President. Four recent resolutions of the Senate express its concern for full conservation, development, and utilization of the Nation's land and water resources, and call for programs commensurate with national requirements. The factual analyses to be secured pursuant to Senate Resolution 48 will provide the basis for determining what programs and other measures, both public and private, are requisite to assure that available water resources will meet requirements between now and 1980.

The subject matter of the needed analyses falls within the jurisdiction of four standing committees of the Senate: The Committees on Interior and Insular Affairs, Public Works, Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and Agriculture and Forestry. In order to secure comprehensive and coordinated examination, the resolution provides for a temporary special committee to be composed of members of those four standing committees. This select committee will be of limited duration terminating on January 31, 1961, by which time it is to report its findings and recommendations. Being a study committee, it would not impinge on the legislative functions of the standing committees.

The resolution calls for recommendations based on studies regarding (a) the character and extent of water resource programs that will be needed between now and 1980; and (b) the character of legislation that will encourage new methods for increasing water supplies.

In order to be useful to the Senate, the committee's report should respond specifically and factually to questions about water resource programs such as (1) how much water development is needed, (2) when is it needed, (3) where is it needed, (4) what should be the pattern of water development, (5) what levels of cost and expenditures are justifiable for future water development.

Fortunately, for a good many years Federal and State technical agencies have assembled the basic technical data on water resources and water uses. During the first year of its operation, the select committee should therefore be able to compile many of the facts pertinent to these questions.

Two important gaps will need to be filled before this material will be useful in formulating the committee recommendations:

1. It will be necessary to develop guides as to what amounts of water will be required in relation to various levels of population and economic activity. Stated in time periods and by geographic areas, these requirements will indicate the goals of water resource development programs.

2. The second gap to be filled is to provide guides as to the economic limits for water development; that is, what costs per acre-foot are economically justified for water for various uses, and how much expenditure of public and private funds can be economically justified for water programs.

Another phase of the committee's program under this resolution will be concerned with new methods for development of water supplies. This is the phase of the study that has to do with desalinization, evaporation reduction, induced precipitation, and like processes. In this field, the committee should bring together the judgment of competent technical experts regarding the possibilities of the various new methods and, to the extent possible, estimates should be sought of the probable amounts of water yield and the probable cost ranges of the various methods. The views and experience of technical and industrial experts should be analyzed to bring out any suggestions regarding legislative means for encouraging new methods for water resource development.

Because of the diversity of specialized technical material that will have to be analyzed for consideration by the committee, and also because of its temporary character, the needed factual and analytical studies can probably be secured best by placing principal reliance on existing technical organizations rather than by employment of a large committee staff. To this end, the resolution provides that the committee shall make full use of private organizations, schools, institutions, and individuals, as well as the studies and plans of Federal and State agencies. In addition to securing the cooperation of the agencies of the executive branch, the committee should seek to avail itself of the knowledge and information about water resources and water problems that each of the States develops through appropriate State officials. In addition, it is expected that the committee will utilize research contracts with State colleges and universities, and with research institutions, and the major share of the funds requested will be used for such contracts. A limited number of leading authorities in the field of water resources should be available from time to time for consultation and roundtable discussions.

On this basis, it is expected that the committee will require only a very small professional staff of two or three persons to coordinate and interpret the research for the committee.

Other committee expenses relate mainly to the conduct of hearings in Washington and in the field. These hearings will be for the purpose of securing informed public expression regarding the substantive content of the factual analyses as they become available. Consideration by the committee of such public expression will aid it in the formulation of its report and recommendations.

Funds required for these purposes are estimated to be $175,000 for the period ending January 31, 1960. In accordance with the rules, this amount includes the full costs of study contracts that will extend beyond that date, all of which must be authorized before such contracts can be executed.

According to present information, only a much smaller amount is expected to be required for the final 12-month period of the committee's work.

Attached is a tabulation of the estimated budget to January 31, 1960.

Because of the nonpartisan character of this inquiry into water resource requirements, and to avoid unnecessary expenditure, the budget for the committee does not provide separate minority counsel. If, however, the Rules Committee feels that direct minority representation is essential, this would require a somewhat larger staff and as a result, the funds to be allowed might need to be increased.

If desired by the Committee on Rules and Administration, I shall be very glad to appear before it in support of the budget.

Sincerely yours,

CLINTON P. ANDERSON,
U.S. Senator.

The motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a statement which I have prepared may be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks. I do so in order to pay tribute to the able Senator from Montana and his colleagues, who have done a fine piece of work.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR ANDERSON RELATIVE TO SENATE RESOLUTION 48, TO ESTABLISH A SELECT COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL WATER RESOURCES

Senate Resolution 48, to establish a Select Committee on National Water Resources, is now before the Senate with perfecting amendments and a favorable report by the Committee on Rules and Administration. It was my privilege to present the favorable report on the resolution for the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

Before discussing the resolution, I wish to give recognition to its sponsor, the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. MANSFIELD] and the cosponsor, his senior colleague from Montana [Mr. MURRAY]. I know that I speak for a great number of the other Senators—probably all of them—in expressing appreciation to the authors of the resolution for the keen and broad-visioned leadership that they provide in water resource matters. Their sponsorship of this resolution is another demonstration of that leadership. The resolution brings to focus the immediacy and the urgency of the nationwide water problem. Senate Resolution 48, furthermore, provides the Senate with a practical and feasible means for coming to grips with the water problem and with the responsibilities of the Senate for water resource development.

Nationally, our water problems are now more critical than they have ever been before, and we know that they will increase in gravity in the coming years. I say this because increased use of water in the coming years is a certainty, and it is certain also that the increase will be very large. Two principal factors cause this, one factor being the increase in population, the other factor being increase in average water use per person. Estimates of future population and future per capita water use vary within rather wide limits, but all of them confirm the gravity of the problem. A conservative estimate of the water required by 1980 is based on the assumed population of about 210 million and only moderate increase in per capita use, but even this estimate calls for a 50-percent increase in the water supplies available. Other estimates by highly qualified experts indicate that by 1980 the increase in water requirements may be in the order of 250 percent.

In discussing water supplies and requirements, I am reminded again of a startling demonstration of how our new standards of living create increased water requirements. I commented recently about a magazine illustration of a new real estate development of the moderate-price range of homes. This picture shows several square blocks of homes and, on both sides of the street every house has its own private swimming pool. Private residence swimming pools, I am told, on the average, use about 90,000 gallons of water—that is, approximately three times the average capacity. And swimming pools are now being installed in this country at the rate of about 50,000 to 60,000 new private pools per year.

I do not mean to suggest that swimming pools by themselves are a major factor in water problems—although in certain communities they have placed a terrific stress on the municipal water supply facilities. What I am pointing out is that not only is the U.S. population increasing, but also all of our municipal and industrial developments are taking far more water.

There is a significant article on the front page of the Wall Street Journal for Friday, April 10, 1959. I quote just two sentences from that article:

"If the current (population) growth curve continues, asserts the Census Bureau, the United States will contain 260 million people by 1980. That would be a leap of 84 million from today's tally and more than double the increase in any similar past period."

That same Wall Street Journal reminds us of the data that technical men have already presented about the increased rate of per capita use. At the beginning of the century, daily per capita use (including industrial use) was about 530 gallons; by 1950 this average had risen to 1,340 gallons, and the estimate for 1970 is 1,950 gallons per capita per day.

Will there be enough water to meet these requirements? The Chief Hydrologist of the Geological Survey has said: "As matters stand now, most water that is immediately available and inexpensive to use at each individual point is in use already." This means that the additional water required to supply the increased uses will have to be provided through conservation and development of water resources, and through improved coordination of the prospective uses.

There are many opportunities for increasing the supplies of water for the increased future uses. Substantial increase of water uses can be provided through conservation by means of storage and regulation of flows, and through other works for river regulation. There are also several challenging opportunities to expand the amounts of the usable supplies by new technologies for desalinization of brackish and saline waters, reduction of losses due to evaporation and evapo-transpiration, seepage control, wastewater salvage, and similar applications of recent technical advances.

Such water development programs, however, must be undertaken far in advance of the requirements for the water. Even relatively small water projects take 10 to 15 years for planning and construction, and most projects that would provide substantial quantities of water take correspondingly longer time. This indicates that the projects and other measures needed to meet the 1980 requirements for water should be started in the very near future.

A great share of the responsibility for meeting the future water needs of the country is squarely on the Congress. To intelligently fulfill this obligation we must have a great deal of information concerning our present situation and our future needs that we do not have now.

It is the purpose of Senate Resolution 48 to provide this much needed information. We will get the required information if the authority is granted to proceed with the studies proposed by this resolution.

WORLD DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York wish to speak on the labor bill?

Mr. JAVITS. No. I intend to speak on another subject.

Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. JAVITS. Is time limited on a matter other than the labor bill? I seek recognition on another subject than the pending measure.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. JAVITS. Is the time controlled upon subjects other than the labor bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not.

Mr. JAVITS. I seek recognition upon another subject.

I have been yielded 10 minutes, and I shall use it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank my colleague, the majority leader.

I am introducing for appropriate reference, on behalf of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], and myself, a bill to establish a World Development Corporation for the purpose of stimulating free world economic growth by increasing materially the amount of private capital which flows from the United States and other industrial nations into the less developed areas of the non-Communist world.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 1743) to promote an increasing flow of private capital from the United States into economically sound enterprises in other areas of the world, to enlist an ever-increasing number of individual private investors in this undertaking, to promote world peace through the expansion of mutual economic interests, to reduce gradually the need for U.S. foreign public investments and grants, to establish a World Development Corporation, and for other related purposes, introduced by Mr. JAVITS (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, people like myself and many of my colleagues feel that upon the United States will rest the responsibility whether, through the use of capital and credit, we can help to bring about higher standards of living, especially in the free world, upon which will depend our success as the free world's leader, and the success of the forces of freedom, as against the competing forces of communism, which assure the underdeveloped areas that the best way whereby to bring themselves abreast of the modern world is by doing it under the Communist system.

In the areas of the world where the two systems are in direct competition, as they are in Communist China and in India, this becomes a seriously pertinent question and, indeed, the whole question of survival of free institutions in the world. The idea of a World Development Corporation is one way by which we are seeking to do what can be done on a continuing operating basis with the aid of what the free world knows the best, and that is with the aid of individuals and voluntary investments.

Operating as a worldwide equity investment agency, the World Development Corporation would obtain capital funds for investment overseas in private businesses and economic development projects primarily through the sale of stock at $5 a share to millions of small investors with a long-range objective of $15 billion of purchased invested capital.

The basic plan for the World Development Corporation has been developed by Benjamin A. Javits, lawyer and economist, with the assistance of Leon H. Keyserling, consulting economist and former Chairman of the President's Council on Economic Advisers.

Benjamin Javits, who is my brother, is the author of several articles and books on the subject of peace through investment, and in 1958 he traveled extensively in Europe and Asia to gain support for a World Development Corporation from leaders in government, finance and investment, international economics, business, labor, and other branches of economic activity.

Right now, as we marshal the economic, spiritual, and political resources which must be brought to bear by the United States in meeting the Communists' massive cold war offensive, we must devise a meaningful role in this grim struggle which can be played by the average citizen. The World Development Corporation is the kind of provocative, stimulating proposal which may well prove, at least in part, the solution to this vital, yet perplexing problem of giving our people a direct sense of participation in developing opportunities for the people of the world and countering the Soviet threat.

In dramatic, realistic terms, the Corporation would offer an individual even in the lower income brackets an opportunity to buy a share in world peace—to invest in the future of his family, his country, and the democratic way of life through investing in the steady, yet peaceful, economic growth and expansion of underdeveloped areas in Latin America, Africa, and Asia.

As citizens of the leading nation of the free world, we are well aware of the tremendous social and economic gains which have paralleled the development of our highly industrialized, private enterprise economy. Such firsthand knowledge is not possessed by the head of a family in Ceylon, Paraguay, or India where the average lifespan is 43 years or less and the per capita income rarely exceeds $100 annually. It is this man, and millions more like him who are the prime targets of the Communist bloc nations' brand of economic warfare which has already earmarked about $1.7 billion in economic aid alone to underdeveloped areas in the last 4 years.

I should like to emphasize at this point that Communist China within the past few years has advanced about $120 million out of its straitened economy for the purpose of foreign economic assistance.

It is apparent that the United States will have to sustain a high level of economic aid to these areas through such instruments as the Development Loan Fund for several years to come, and in all probability it may be necessary, if we are to do the job necessary to be done to double such aid from nearly $1 billion annually to $2 billion a year in the next 5 years. However, we need not commit ourselves to a fiscal race with the Russians in which we match Federal dollars against rubles in the field of foreign economic aid, not if we will only capitalize on an alternative which no totalitarian Communist regime can enlist—private capital.

Presuming that a World Development Corporation is in operation and our Federal outlays for oversea economic assistance is doubled by 1964, it is not illogical to predict that in public and private funds combined, our foreign economic activity will amount to about $7 billion a year—or almost twice the present rate of economic aid and new direct private investment.

The achievement of this interim 5-year goal—during which our net outflow of private oversea investment would increase from about $3 billion annually to more than $5 billion—should create the foundation and instrumentalities for a greatly enlarged long-range economic development program, with the importance of the private dollar overseas in underdeveloped areas steadily outstripping that of the public tax dollar. While the Federal outlay remains around the $2 billion mark, the net outflow of private investment should eventually increase to about $13 billion annually. Of that amount, about $6 billion would flow through customary channels, responsive to the stimulative effect of $2 billion a year of public investment, and more importantly, responsive to the effect of about $7 billion a year of private investment through the World Development Corporation. At that point, the ratio between direct private investment and public outflow would be about 6½ to 1, compared with the present ratio of about 2½ to 3 to 1.

By projecting overseas the uniquely successful blend of private and public efforts which is so basic a characteristic of the U.S. economic system, we can prove to the people of underdeveloped areas that a vital economy can produce far more under freedom than a totalitarian economy can under the push-botton economic and political control of dictatorship. With U.S. private investment stimulating a total economic assistance level approaching $15 billion a year, the cost to the U.S.S.R. of competing would be fantastically high. In attempting to keep pace, the Communist bloc nations would almost certainly endanger their ambitious plans for industrial expansion and better living standards now being highly publicized to the threadbare populations in their own countries.

The fact remains, however, that we are now at the eleventh hour of need for searching out workable methods to expand private overseas investment and that until quite recently the whole project suffered from gross neglect. Last year, Congress enacted an amendment, which I had the honor to sponsor, to the Mutual Security Act of 1958 authorizing the State Department to prepare a special report on the role of private enterprise in advancing the foreign policy objectives of the United States. The study, made by Ralph Strauss of New York as Director under the authority of Under Secretary of State Douglas Dillon, was issued earlier this month under the title "Expanding Private Investment for Free World Economic Growth." It clearly envisions the need and the practicality of the approach utilized by the World Development Corporation.

In advocating the establishment of international development investment companies, the study outlines their functions which include setting up a mechanism which would accumulate private U.S. capital for investment abroad in partnership with local business, providing a private financing source from which new or expanding private enterprises in less developed countries could turn for management help, providing a private contact point in the United States where businessmen overseas can apply for private U.S. capital or technical assistance, and creating private U.S. organizations which have a strong business incentive to search out and develop private investment opportunities in the less developed countries. In essence, the proposed World Development Corporation encompasses these objectives and functions within its overall framework.

The question may be asked why should we have a World Development Corporation? The endeavor would be to get the Corporation off the ground by having the Federal Government subscribe for $500 million of the special class B stock, which would be retired out of the investment by private individuals in class A stock, expected to attain the figure of $15 billion, as I have described it. In that way there would not be a Government corporation, but a private corporation.

During the initial period the Corporation's management would comprise a Board of Directors and 21 members, consisting of a President and Executive Vice President appointed by the President of the United States and 9 members appointed from private life by the President of the United States, and additional members as I have outlined in my summary. When the Government finally got out of the business, the Board of Directors would be expected to represent the most outstanding financial and development organizations in all the free world.

It is time that Americans stopped apologizing for the profit motive which underlies our entire business system. We should turn our commercial genius to the task of merchandising the tool kit of private enterprise made up of capital, know-how, individual initiative, and resourcefulness so that it will appeal to almost a billion people who live in areas with per capita living standards now at fantastically low levels, as the most dynamic, most practical way of achieving a better life while preserving free institutions. Toward that objective, a proposal like the World Development Corporation merits the most serious consideration.

Mr. President, actually billions of dollars worth of securities are traded every day on the New York Stock Exchange. Yet think of the concern with which the appropriation of $225 million or $700 million for the Development Loan Fund is regarded by the Senate or the other body. I emphasize that fact to show that the tremendous resource of private investment, which is the dominant characteristic of the economic system of the United States, must somehow be enlisted in the tremendous effort which we must make, for we must utilize money and credit, while the Communists seek to utilize force and iron discipline by totalitarian government. In this competition we cannot stint with our weapons any more than they are stinting with theirs. We will not be fighting this battle effectively unless we throw into the balance the resources of our private economic system, primarily the private investment system.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an explanation of the bill may be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the explanation was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY OF BILL TO ESTABLISH WORLD DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

GENERAL PURPOSES

The general purposes of the bill, as stated in its opening language, are: "to promote an increasing flow of private capital from the United States into economically sound enterprises in other areas of the world, to enlist an ever-increasing number of individual private investors in this undertaking, to promote world peace through the expansion of mutual economic interests, to reduce gradually the need for U.S. public investments and grants overseas, to establish a World Development Corporation, and for other related purposes."

MAIN FEATURES OF THE BILL

(1) A World Development Corporation is proposed as an American corporation. Its major purpose, as a worldwide equity investment agency, would be to make available funds of a private capital nature to assist in the financing of economic development projects and private business in countries other than the United States, deemed to contribute to the sound economic development of the country in which the project is located. As a necessary condition of such funds, the Corporation would have to find that such project met sound economic criteria, had been undertaken after consultation with the country in which the project would be located, and that funds from other sources would not flow readily to accomplish the same purposes.

In support of this major purpose, the World Development Corporation would also be authorized, as an investment trust, to purchase minor stock interests in domestic and foreign corporations engaged in overseas development activity already in being under effective management. In further support of its major purpose, the Corporation would also be empowered to insure upon payments of appropriate premiums, to the degree found actuarially sound and in accord with the general purposes of the Corporation, a reasonable annual rate of return on the outstanding investment of any private investor in a project eligible for basic financial assistance by the Corporation.

(2) The Corporation would obtain capital funds for its operation basically by offering its class B stock for public sale, predominantly to small investors, at a price yielding $5 per share to the Corporation. Not more than 500 million shares of this type of stock, totaling $2½ billion, could be sold in any 1 year, and not more than 3 billion shares could be sold in the aggregate under the provisions of the bill. This would result ultimately in a maximum of $15 billion worth of class B stock.

(3) To provide initial and temporary capital funds for its operations, the Corporation would be authorized to issue class A stock of a hundred shares of par value of $1 million per share, totaling $100 million. This class A stock would be subscribed to by the U.S. Government through the Secretary of the Treasury. The Corporation would also be authorized to obtain initial and temporary capital funds for its operations by issuing obligations to the U.S. Treasury, or by issuing obligations guaranteed by the Treasury. Such obligations would be authorized to be issued only during the first 6 years of the life of the Corporation, could not be issued in excess of $500 million in any 1 year, nor could the total amount outstanding in the form of such obligations exceed $2 billion at any time. Such obligations would be interest bearing.

(4) The bill contains various provisions for the application of the proceeds of the sale of the class B stock to the retirement of the class A stock, which would have to be retired in full in 6 years or less, and also to the retirement in full of the other obligations referred to just above, preferably within 6 years but in any event within 26 years of the initial issue.

(5) So long as any class A stock remained outstanding, the Corporation would be an independent agency of the United States, and such class A stock would be the only stock of the Corporation having any voting power so long as any of it remained outstanding. During this period, the Corporation's management would consist of a Board of Directors of 21 members, consisting of a President and Executive Vice President appointed by the President of the United States, and 9 members appointed from private life by the President of the United States, all with the advice and consent of the Senate; 6 members appointed by the President of the United States from various U.S. agencies concerned with international economic development; and the Secretaries of State, Treasury, Commerce, and Labor, serving ex officio. Upon final retirement of the class A stock within 6 years or sooner, and upon retirement of a sufficient amount (as determined by the Secretary of the Treasury) of the obligations issued to or guaranteed by the U.S. Treasury, the exclusive voting power of the Corporation vested in its class A stock would be transferred to the class B stock. At this stage, further legislation would be proposed, in order that the Corporation subsequently would function under private ownership and management.

CESSATION OF ATMOSPHERIC NUCLEAR TESTS

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I yield 7 minutes to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I wish to commend President Eisenhower for the use of the prestige and initiative of the Office of the President in urging the Premier of Russia, Mr. Khrushchev, to accept the treaty proposal of the United States and Great Britain that all atmospheric nuclear tests be stopped, and that this proposal be regarded as a step toward the international control of nuclear weapons tests.

It is, according to the scientists, from tests within the atmosphere of the earth that the health hazard of radioactive contamination of the air comes. Therefore, it is imperative that this goal be achieved, and the accomplishment of this goal would be far preferable to the failure of the conference in Geneva.

In the capacity of Senate adviser to the conference, I was informed 1 week ago of this letter. According to the wire services, the existence of the letter was revealed by the Soviets in Geneva today. This is a matter of sufficient importance to require and justify the full and active personal attention of the President—which I know it has had—and it is a matter of sufficient significance to justify the full, active, and personal intervention by the President, with the full power and prestige of the Office of the Presidency, with the head of state of the Soviet Union.

I am glad that the President has used this direct approach. Once again, as I did 1 week ago today on the floor of the Senate, I plead with the Soviet leaders to accept this proposal on the part of the U.S. Government as one which is made in good faith and in the interest of humanity. I believe this is an achievable goal which could be a major first step on the road to better international understanding and peace.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. CHURCH. I join with the Senator from Tennessee in expressing my appreciation of the fact that the President of the United States has added his personal endorsement to the proposal which was made to the Soviet Union a week ago that the United States and the United Kingdom would be agreeable to a ban on atmospheric tests of nuclear weapons. By lending the great prestige and importance of his Office to this proposal, the President has demonstrated the importance which the United States has attached to the necessity of reaching a successful and fair agreement at the Geneva Conference. The President's personal endorsement of the proposal means that it is no tactical maneuver calculated to give us some transient advantage at the conference table, but is a serious proposition, earnestly made.

I am gratified that the President has gone directly to Mr. Khrushchev with it. He has plainly put it up to the Soviet leader himself to throw the door open to an agreement which can end the poisoning of the air by fallout, without jeopardy, real or fancied, to any country concerned.

Six weeks ago, on the floor of the Senate, I urged that this course be taken at Geneva. A few days ago I had occasion to place in the RECORD a chronology of events leading up to the decision to submit this proposal to the Soviet Union, a proposal which was labeled as a major change of policy in the position of the United States and the United Kingdom. Since that time, two items published in two of Idaho's leading newspapers have come to my attention. They illustrate the extent to which the press is contributing to the growing awareness and interest of the people in developments at Geneva. The first is an article published by the Caldwell Times and announces the latest proposal of our Government. The other item is an editorial comment on the proposal, published in the Lewiston Morning Tribune. I ask unanimous consent that the article and editorial be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES PRESENTS CHURCH PLAN ON NUCLEAR TEST CONTROL—RUSSIAN REACTION NEGATIVE ON SURFACE EXPLOSION BAN

[From the Caldwell (Idaho) Times, Apr. 13, 1959]

GENEVA.—The United States and Britain asked the Soviet Union today to agree to a prompt controlled suspension of nuclear weapons tests on or near the surface of the earth—leaving the problem of other types of blasts for later negotiations. Informants said the proposal provided for splitting up the test suspension problem. It was advanced as the three-power talks resumed after an Easter recess. The new U.S. proposal was in line with the plan recently presented in the U.S. Senate by Senator FRANK CHURCH.

First Soviet reaction was reported to be negative. Under the new Western plan, agreement would be reached at once on banning surface and atomic nuclear tests—the ones which cause dangerous radioactive fallout.

Such an agreement would not cover very high altitude and underground atomic and hydrogen weapons blasts. Such explosions—difficult to police in any event—could be covered in some subsequent agreement reached after the first problem had been solved, in line with Senator CHURCH's plan.

U.S. Ambassador James J. Wadsworth and British Minister of State David Ormsby-Gore proposed dividing the nuclear problem into two parts with the idea of getting quick agreement on the types of tests easiest to detect. The ending of such tests also would avoid any health hazards to the world's population.

The sources pointed out that the United States and Britain would prefer an agreement covering the entire range of tests. But the Western powers recognized that this conference, which began its deliberations on October 31, now was bogged down on East-West differences about controls.

Presumably the limited agreement now suggested as a first step would require less elaborate policing arrangements than a total ban. The Western powers, however, want foolproof controls built into any type of agreement they sign.

The plan would ban all tests at or near ground level, which cause dangerous fallout. It would permit high altitude and deep underground blasts, which Western experts contend produce no harmful results.

Judging from the line taken in a Soviet Foreign Ministry statement Sunday, the Soviet position has not changed since the conference recessed March 19 for Easter after 5 futile months of talking.

The Soviets clearly still want a veto over any inspection and control machinery established to enforce a test ban.

Officials in Washington said that if underground and high altitude tests were exempted from the ban, adequate inspection measures might be easier to agree on. Prohibition of lower-level blasts could be more readily enforced, they said, because the fallout produced in such tests makes them much more easily detectable.

[From the Lewiston (Idaho) Morning Tribune, Apr. 14, 1959]

THE CHURCH PLAN GOES TO SOVIETS

The proposal by the United States and Britain yesterday to ban testing of nuclear weapons in the earth's atmosphere was an encouraging one—even though the first Russian reaction was to reject it.

The Western appeal called upon the Soviet Union to agree to stop testing nuclear weapons on or near the surface of the earth. These are the explosions which pollute the earth's atmosphere with radioactive fallout. They also are the explosions which are easiest to detect.

The West therefore asked the Soviet Union to agree to a suspension of tests of nuclear explosions in the atmosphere, leaving for later consideration the vexing issue of what to do about underground, underwater, and outer space explosions.

Soviet Delegate Semyon Tsarapkin's initial reaction to the Western proposal at three-power talks at Geneva was negative. "It is not acceptable," he declared. "We have got to stop everything."

However, the Soviet Union will be under considerable pressure from world opinion to weigh carefully this plan to salvage some measure of agreement from the deadlocked conference on control of nuclear weapons. If the Russians summarily reject a plan to stop the test explosions which are the easiest to detect and which cause radioactive fallout endangering the world's health, then the evidence will be pretty conclusive that they do not really want to stop testing at all. Their propaganda position in the world will be weak indeed if they reject a proposal as reasonable as this one.

Idaho citizens have particular reason to be proud of the West's latest compromise plan, incidentally, because it originally was proposed in the Senate by Senator FRANK CHURCH, Democrat, of Idaho.

More than a month go, CHURCH said in a Senate speech:

"As a last resort, to attempt the avoidance of total failure, I strongly urge that the United States make this final proposal: An agreement to suspend further nuclear weapons tests in the earth's atmosphere, within the framework of a trustworthy and sufficient international control system, adequate to reliably detect and report any violation. Such a proposal would exclude for the present any agreement involving suspension or control of nuclear tests occurring underground, underwater, or in outer space, none of which contribute to the pollution of the air, the grave cause of so much concern."

Interestingly enough, only two Idaho newspapers, the Caldwell Times and this one, paid any editorial attention at the time to CHURCH's proposal. His plan won considerably more notice, however, from newspapers and magazines of a national character—a coincidence which is rather familiar by now to Idaho's junior Senator. And it now appears that his idea was good enough to convince the Governments of the United States and Britain, even if it did not impress some of his fellow Idahoans. The big question now, of course, is whether it can convince the Russians.

While the first Soviet reaction was negative, there is still grounds for hope that the Western proposal will win approval. The Geneva Conference has been under way since last October 31. It has been deadlocked for months now on the adamant positions of Russia and the West. Russia insists that all nuclear testing should be outlawed immediately by a simple declaration of the nations involved that they will go and test no more. The United States and Britain insist that bans on testing must be accompanied by an adequate inspection system to prevent cheating. The Russians reply that an inspection arrangement would open their homeland to a network of spies probing into Soviet secrets under the guise of inspections. The West answers that it would be absurd to ban nuclear testing without safeguards to assure compliance.

If one could assume that both the Soviet and Western positions were sincere, the plan now proposed should be welcomed by both camps. It would stop the testing of nuclear weapons in the earth's atmosphere, where the world's health is threatened. It would eliminate the need for an elaborate inspection system, because explosions in the atmosphere already can be detected easily. Yet, it would assure that the rest of the world would have more to rely upon than a Soviet scrap of paper in return for a decision to stop the testing of nuclear weapons.

The question of testing above and below the earth's atmosphere would not be resolved by this plan, of course, and it would be much better to agree on a method to ban all nuclear tests if such an agreement were at all possible.

The evidence of the Geneva Conference thus far makes it clear beyond question that such an inclusive agreement is not possible, however. The issue now is whether the biggest nuclear evil can be controlled while the nations continue to search for machinery to cope with the lesser ones. The West has submitted a constructive and hopeful plan to bring tremendous progress out of hopeless deadlock. The Soviet Union should ponder carefully indeed before wrecking the conference finally with a rejection.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I commend the distinguished Senator from Tennessee for the great interest he has shown in this field, for the imaginative leadership which he has given and which has done so much to stimulate new thought in what must be regarded as humanity's effort to clean the air from the corruption which is growing each day due to the continued explosions of nuclear bombs in the atmosphere.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I am grateful to the distinguished junior Senator from Idaho and I wish to commend him for his able efforts in this field. His efforts, like those of the junior Senator from Tennessee and those of other Senators of both parties, and like the effort of the administration, are nonpartisan in nature. This is truly a field in which public servants can and must strive with all good will.

Mr. President, in the unfortunate event that the Soviets refuse to accept this step-by-step approach, then I hope President Eisenhower will continue to give this matter his active personal attention; that he will act unilaterally; that he will direct—and will so announce to the world—that the United States stop all atmospheric tests for a given period of time—say, 3 years—as a further demonstration of America's concern with this matter; and that he will give further invitation to the Soviets to join in such a stoppage and to join in a treaty to make the stoppage permanent.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Test Bans and Law," which was published in the Chattanooga Times.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEST BANS AND THE LAW

"It is not acceptable. We have got to stop everything."

This same Soviet song, verse into the hundreds of thousands, on the latest U.S. atom test proposal illustrates again the prospects for meaningful settlements with Moscow.

Acting on a new plan given important and effective impetus by Senator ALBERT GORE, of Tennessee, Washington has now offered to suspend all nuclear testing on the ground and 30 miles up into the air. It is further indicated that this country will ban such tests indefinitely whatever the Russians do, in a move fully sanctioned in the Defense Department and calculated to show the world once again our good faith in the quest for peace. It would ease the way for further agreements on underground and outer space tests.

Also importantly, this plan apparently would not necessarily involve the stationing of inspection teams on Soviet soil. Testing points on ships at sea and elsewhere could be employed to see whether the agreement was being kept.

The Soviet veto over such inspection teams has stalled the discussions in Geneva since last October. Soviet refusal to provide adequate guarantees against breach of disarmament pacts has blocked progress now for more than a decade.

But the reaction of the Soviet delegate—"not acceptable"—was immediate in Geneva.

Not only did that reaction darken the cloud over the negotiations to start May 11 at the foreign ministers' level between the Big Four Powers.

It left little doubt as to what the Soviet attitude would be toward Vice President NIXON's idea, also newly broached and important, of working toward an agreement to submit any future east-west disputes to the International Court of Justice.

U.S. agreements to abide by World Court decisions on major issues, whether or not Russia does the same, as some groups have urged, is an entirely different matter. But some way must be found to strengthen the Court's role.

The Justices of the International Court are paid $24,000 a year, tax free. In the past 13 years the Court has disposed of 10 cases (while the U.S. Supreme Court was handling 13,000). It is the least used and to date the least effective agency of the United Nations.

But experience, including that in the $1.3 million U.S. claim over the shooting down of an unarmed plane in the Sea of Japan, in which the Soviet Union declined the Court's jurisdiction, holds little or no promise of progress.

Still, we must keep trying. Many may have wondered why a matter of this import was raised by the Vice President rather than the President, with his added international prestige. But it is one more message to the world that is likely to show that Soviet protestations and Soviet deeds are not the same thing.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL TOMORROW, AT 11 A.M.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, pursuant to the order which was entered earlier today, I move that the Senate now stand in adjournment until tomorrow, at 11 a.m.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 2 minutes p.m.) the Senate adjourned, under the order previously entered, until tomorrow, Tuesday, April 21, 1959, at 11 o'clock a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, APRIL 20, 1959

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Robert A. Holland, B.D., pastor, Willoughby Baptist Church, Willoughby, Ohio, offered the following prayer:

God's word says according to the prophet Isaiah: And thine ears shall hear a word behind thee, saying, This is the way, walk ye in it, when ye turn to the right hand, and when ye turn to the left. (Isaiah 30: 21.)

Our God and Father, as we bow ourselves before Thee, we pray Thy infinite love and wisdom upon each Member of this august body. May they be dedicated to serve the people of this Nation which Thou hast caused to grow and prosper. Let each individual search the deep recesses of his heart, and with the heart under the leadership of Thy holy spirit may Thy servants seek what is right. May they with courage discharge that sacred duty for the good of all mankind that Thy holy name might be glorified.

We pray for the President of the United States and for all men who serve with him in places of authority. May it please Thee to govern their heart and life in such a manner as to assure justice and peace among all nations until Thy kingdom is come, and all creatures bow down together to Thy kingship.

We thank Thee, O God, for Thy Son Jesus and for Thy grace that allows us communication with Thee. Forgive us our sins and lead us into ways of righteousness we ask through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, April 16, 1959, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. McGown, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 5508. An act to provide for the free importation of articles for exhibition at fairs, exhibitions, or expositions, and for other purposes.

ELIZABETH LUCIE LEON

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H.R. 2589) for the relief of Elizabeth Lucie Leon (also known as Lucie Noel), with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Line 8, after "naturalization" insert "and to be naturalized".

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

INTERNATIONAL FOOD-FOR-PEACE BILL OF 1959

Mr. JOHNSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, America's abundant farm production can be a tremendous blessing to a hungry world. It has long been my belief that we can win more friends with our food than with all the guns and planes we could possibly send overseas. If we can figure out ways to send rockets to the moon, we should be able to find ways of getting our surplus food to hungry people without interfering with the normal channels of trade.

As for the expense of a food diplomacy program, it now costs well over a million dollars a day just to pay storage costs on our present surpluses. And they are not doing us or anybody else any good in a warehouse.

Morally, we cannot justify letting this food lie in storage when three-quarters of the world is in need. Economically, we cannot afford to make whipping boys of our Nation's farmers just because they are doing such an effective job of food production. In times of war, they are hailed as heroes for their herculean efforts along this line. It is hardly fair to condemn them for continuing to improve their farming techniques. As anyone who is familiar with farming knows, farm production cannot be turned off and on like a hot-water faucet.

Today, I am introducing an international food for peace bill which is designed to implement the foreign policy of the United States and build toward world peace by the more effective use of our agricultural commodities for relief of human hunger and for the economic and social development of needy countries around the world. This bill is a revision, expansion, and extension of Public Law 480, which has served a good purpose but which needs to be broadened and redirected.

One of the weaknesses of Public Law 480 is that its various programs have been parceled out to nine agencies of the Government, coordinated by two interagency committees. No one in high authority in the Government devotes full time to the administration of what is, in effect, a store which sells or otherwise distributes $1.5 billion worth of surplus agricultural commodities a year. Obviously, this situation has resulted in a veritable administrative jungle that hampers the rapid and efficient handling of the program.

My bill would eliminate the problem by establishing a Peace Food Administration directly under the President. It would be headed by a Peace Food Administrator who would have the authority to pull together the now widely scattered operations under Public Law 480 and weld them into an efficient operating unit. Effective administration is the key to success of this or any other program.

Senator HUBERT HUMPHREY, of Minnesota, has introduced an international food for peace bill in the Senate, and I am happy to join the Senator by sponsoring this companion bill in the House. His complete and comprehensive analysis of the need for and provisions of the proposed legislation can be found on pages 6119 through 6131 of the April 16 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Both Senator HUMPHREY and I agree that we in the United States should count our abundance of food as one of our choicest blessings. And it is a blessing which we cannot in good conscience refuse to share with the less lucky peoples of the world.

A NEW LOOK AT INFLATION

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, these days everybody is talking inflation, although recent opinion surveys show that the average person is pretty mixed up on just what the word means. Up in the Congress we have a wide range of studies being conducted by various committees, seeking to discover cause, effect, and cure.

The President has put in motion two broad studies: The Cabinet Committee on Price Stability for Economic Growth, headed by Vice President NIXON, and a committee on Government Activities Affecting Prices and Costs, headed by Dr. Raymond Saulnier, Chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers.

On top of all this Government activity and interest, the unions, corporations, trade associations, college professors, and economic foundations are busily pursuing the problem and issuing pamphlets and speeches. Activities of all these groups are reported in the press and on the air, and argued back and forth by business commentators. They are further chronicled in speeches and statements printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Is it any wonder the average citizen—worker, consumer, and stockholder alike—is confused?

In all this welter of activity—some of it based upon new theories, such as Dr. Gardiner Means' "administered price" concept, but much of it based upon well-grounded economic approaches—very little seems to have been contributed to basic facts.

For this reason, two independent studies conducted in recent months by the National Industrial Conference Board and the private economic study organization known as Econometric Specialists, Inc., are worth reviewing for the record. They bring into focus a very important aspect of the problem of inflation: The division of national income between workers and people whose savings provide the tools for production.

The Industrial Conference Board inquiry shows that after exclusion of all taxes labor gets 83.2 cents out of every dollar of income generated in the national economy, while property claims 16.8 cents. The Econometric project used a different approach but obtained substantially similar findings. This study places labor's share at 76 to 85 percent.

Both studies were based on the 1954 census, the last year for which the required figures were available.

The Conference Board study first calculated labor claims for the national economy as a whole. Separate computations were made for each of eight selected commodities to show the labor-cost constituent in their selling price: an automobile, a pound of beef, a bus ride from New York to Boston; a pack of regular cigarettes, a gallon of regular gasoline, a man's business shirt, a pair of man's work shoes, and a ton of steel.

For the national economy, after elimination of all taxes, the board summarized its findings in a table, based on sales value, which shows labor getting from 71.4 to 82.17 percent of the total.

Labor and property claims (after taxes) as shares of total private claims on sales value

	Labor claims	Property claims
	Percent	Percent
Automobile	80.1	19.9
Beef	71.4	28.6
Bus ride	87.2	12.8
Cigarettes	78.6	21.4
Gasoline	79.7	20.3
Man's shirt	80.4	19.6
Man's work shoes	74.8	25.3
Ton of steel	82.17	17.22

Econometric Specialists, Inc., traced total labor content in value of production for the six product groupings of carbon steel, machinery, motor vehicles, paper and paperboard, textiles, and residential housing.

Total labor content in value of production

	Percent
Carbon steel	76
Machinery	81
Motor vehicles	79
Paper and paperboard products	77
Textiles	85
Residential housing	84

The data provided by these two independent studies deserve nationwide attention on at least four counts:

First, the close agreement between the surveys; second, the industries and products analyzed represent basic operations that should give a valid indication of trends throughout the economy; third, the organizations conducting the research are noted for their objectivity and integrity; and fourth, these are the most authoritative figures recently available to show the share of the national income going to labor.

We ought to take a good look at studies such as these, for they tend to put this whole question of inflation into the clearest perspective yet. They help to place in proper position the chicken and the egg, as between wage costs and price increases. The conclusion seems almost inescapable that because they are so large a part of the total, rising labor costs must, in the long run, end up in rising prices.

These figures point simultaneously to the relatively small margin of total costs that represents the return to property. They show how deeply any significant increase in labor's share of the sales value of output would cut into the small margin of income that is now left for meeting property claims—for expanding the Nation's productive resources.

The records of past decades show quite clearly that it is in periods of good profits and peak capital investment by industry that industrial workers have enjoyed highest employment levels and wages.

CUMULATIVE LABOR COSTS

We are familiar with the term "spiraling prices," and perhaps we can summon up a picture of how price increases affect creeping inflation. But these two new studies are like a spotlight, enabling us to visualize also the part that cumulative labor costs play in the price of the final product.

In order to understand how labor costs account for such a large share of the national income, it must be remembered that purchases flow in our complex economy from original sources of raw materials to the final finished product.

As the flow of materials moves along, labor—and labor costs—are steadily being applied to it. In addition to labor costs involved in the manufacturing processes, there are also the labor costs of transportation, of packaging, of wholesaling, and finally, of retailing.

But how many consumers realize that $300 paid for a refrigerator, for instance is made up chiefly of payroll costs accumulated along the complex route of production and distribution?

The steel in the refrigerator, for example, was sold for around $17 when it left the mill. For a $3,000 automobile the required steel costs about $290. These prices at the steel mill, in turn, include labor costs as their chief component—costs incurred not only in the mill, but all the way back to the mines.

NEED FOR HIGHER PRODUCTIVITY

The United States faces grave problems as the result of misunderstanding about labor costs and productivity.

To the extent that higher wage payments have been accompanied by increased productivity, they have helped to advance the country's living standards. But, the important fact is that wage increases have gone far ahead of productivity increases. Government data show that in manufacturing industry as a whole, average hourly earnings—not including wage supplements—increased by 60 percent in the 10 years 1947–56 while productivity rose by only 45 percent.

No one really gains from such inflationary wage increases. The housewife in the home of the wage earner soon finds that the newborn increase in the family's pay envelope has evaporated in higher living costs. The hardest blow is suffered by millions of others whose incomes have not gone up—the people on salaries, fixed incomes, and pensions.

CONSUMERS SQUEEZED BY LABOR COSTS

It hardly needs repeating that as productive efficiency increases, a share of these productivity gains should always be passed on to consumers in lower prices. But this becomes impossible when labor costs sop up all the productivity gains and much more besides.

What has been happening all across this country is symbolized by these facts in the steel industry: labor costs increased by 75 percent in the 1947–56 period, while productivity was increased by an estimated 29 percent, according to latest available BLS data.

All of this is reflected in the declining purchasing power of the consumer's dollar. The 100-cent dollar of 1940 was worth 63 cents in 1947 and by mid-1958 was worth only 49 cents.

FACTS TO BE REMEMBERED

The papers are full of talk about the negotiations in the steel industry. The Government is pressuring both management and labor for a settlement that will not be inflationary—that means a wage increase moderate enough not to affect prices. But who can say whether that is possible. If a product costs more, it usually ends up selling for more.

It would be well, however, for all concerned—unions, management, consumers and Government to understand three key facts underlined by the conference board and econometric studies:

First. Labor claims in 1954 accounted for 83 percent of all claims—excluding taxes—against the national output;

Second. Any new round of wage increases in a basic industry rapidly fans out through the economy by touching off demands for matching increases all along the line—in manufacturing, transportation and distribution;

Third. Each such "round" in a basic industry, and the spreading wave of matching increases in all other industries will have clearly predictable results when not accompanied by equal increases in productivity. The increased wage bills simply force inflationary price increases everywhere along the line—in production, transportation, and distribution.

Since labor unions are subject to little control or regulation, labor leaders have it in their power either to weaken or to strengthen the national economy, according to what course of action they choose.

Companies that are forced by added labor and other costs to ask for price increases in order to stay in business find themselves under two natural restrictions. Of these, competition is the first; the second is consumer ability or willingness to pay the advancing costs.

Squeezed between these disciplines, many companies have been quite unable in recent years to cover all their increasing wage costs by adequate price rises. The evidence is in their declining profit ratios. The steel industry, for instance, has managed to match its prewar ratio on sales—8.1 percent in 1940—in only 1 year of the postwar inflation spiral.

For all manufacturing industry the ratio of profits to sales has declined from 7 percent in 1948 to 4.8 percent in 1957, according to the Securities and Exchange Commission.

One of the most dangerous consequences of inflationary wage increases—one which saps the growth power of the entire American economy—is depletion of the margin of capital available for investment in tools to increase productivity.

The importance to our economic welfare of replacement and development of tools cannot be ignored. Without the tools we now have—using only obsolete tools like those of eastern Asia—we should see our level of productivity drop to an insignificant fraction of today's.

And how were our modern tools developed? Through invention and improvement on invention, made possible in the United States by our free enterprise system of risk capital—capital accumulated a little at a time from savings and the profits of previous ventures.

Without the chance to accumulate these amounts we would still have an oxcart economy; the hand plow would still be used on our farms. We would be living much as our ancestors did—in times before the improvement, replacement, and development of tools brought this Nation, by good use of venture capital, to living standards we take for granted today.

GOVERNMENT CONTROLS?

One alternative to our system of risk capital does exist: Capital investment by Government, under stern political controls. Either by direct taxation or by inflation, Government would raise the required funds. But the experience of many countries with political control of industry shows the unfortunate results of political management over economic enterprise. It invariably leads to problems still greater than those it was supposed to solve.

Our American economy has flourished as the purchasing power and living standards of the people have advanced, and everyone today surely believes in the highest possible wage levels. But wage increases which overleap productivity and bring on further inflation are an attack on the welfare of all.

I should like to insert in the RECORD at this point outlines of the studies by both the National Industrial Conference Board and Econometric Specialists, Inc.:

NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL CONFERENCE BOARD—THE RELATIVE SIZE OF LABOR CLAIMS, PROPERTY CLAIMS, AND TAX CLAIMS, NATIONALLY AND IN SELECTED COMMODITIES

EXPLANATION OF THE STUDY

In this study, definitions of labor claims, property claims, and tax claims are defined as follows:

Labor claims: payments to individuals in return for services rendered. These include all wages, salaries and supplements paid by corporate profits, earnings on the investment agricultural enterprises and governments. Also included are imputed labor payments to the self-employed. Not included are government and business transfer payments—such as unemployment insurance payments, or cancellations of bad debts—which are income to the recipient, but are not paid in return for services performed. From this total are deducted the personal income taxes falling on labor incomes.

Property claims: payments to individuals and businesses (corporate and unincorporated) in return for the use of existing tangible and liquid assets. These include corporate profits, earnings on the investment of unincorporated enterprises, interest payments to individuals and rental income of individuals. From this total are deducted the personal and corporate taxes falling on property incomes.

Tax claims: include all direct taxes on the incomes of individuals and corporations, and all indirect taxes, of Federal, State and local governments. In general, taxes which do not arise as a result of current production and trade—capital gains taxes, estate taxes, gift taxes—are not included.

In general, the procedure for allocation of claims against total national output took the form of a series of adjustments to the statistics of the Department of Commerce on national income by distributive shares.

(a) The national income account treats the income of unincorporated business and farm enterprises as a distinct classification of income; in the Conference Board report, the wage, property, and tax components of this income are identified.

(b) The national income total is reported before deduction of all direct taxes. While the corporate tax burden is shown as a separate component, there is no identification of the personal tax burden in the national income figures. The Conference Board study segregates the tax portion of corporate incomes, and extracts personal taxes from labor and property claims.

(c) The national income account excludes two money flows which are claims against the national product—namely, capital consumption allowances and indirect business taxes. The Conference Board study includes indirect business taxes as tax claims, and segregates the labor, property, and tax claims embedded in capital consumption allowances.

The study finds that in 1954 total claims against gross national product were divided as follows: labor claims, 63.1 percent; property claims, 12.7 percent; and tax claims, 24.2 percent. The distribution of all private claims—that is, all claims excluding tax claims—was as follows: labor claims, 83.2 percent; and property claims, 16.8 percent.

With respect to allocations of claims for individual commodities, the procedure was to identify the margins, after materials cost, which are available for distribution to labor, to the owners of the capital employed, and to government in the form of direct and indirect taxes. These distributions of claims for each margin were then summed to arrive at the distribution of total claims.

The Board study deals with the final sale value of each commodity—that is, the retail value—in all cases except steel bars, where the mill price was used. The study calculates the distribution of claims for each commodity as among labor, property, and tax claims; it also calculates the distribution of all private claims—that is, all claims excluding tax claims. Only the latter set of distributions is reproduced here.

ECONOMETRIC SPECIALISTS, INC.—THE RELATIVE SIZE OF LABOR CLAIMS, PROPERTY CLAIMS, AND TAX CLAIMS, NATIONALLY AND IN SELECTED COMMODITIES

EXPLANATION OF THE STUDY

The purpose of this study was to ascertain the relative importance of labor cost, direct and indirect, in the value of production of six representative industries: carbon steel, machinery, motor vehicles, paper, textiles, and residential housing.

The proportion of direct labor cost in the value of production is relatively easy of identification and is often included in the annual reports of leading companies. However, what was sought in this inquiry was the full labor content of a typical motor vehicle, a typical machine, a typical residential dwelling, and so on. By labor cost is meant the payment both of wages and salaries as well as social security, pensions, and other wage benefits.

The inquiry was directed mainly to the other major cost elements in production, to find the labor content in each. Thus, each industry consumes a certain amount of raw materials, fuels, semifinished goods and various kinds of services in the manufacture of its product. In addition, each industry lays aside sums for depreciation to pay for the capital consumed in the production process. Moreover, each industry must pay taxes to local, State, and Federal Governments. Each of these cost elements in the value of the finished product have been examined for their labor content. In these instances the labor content is indirect, but exists nonetheless.

The study was therefore divided into four stages, of which the second required the largest amount of analysis.

1. The first phase was concerned with ascertaining the direct labor cost in each of the six industries.

2. The second and major phase was directed to tracing the labor component of the materials used in producing the six products being investigated back to the earliest supplying stage; i.e., the manufacture of fuels and power for use in the production process. Here were estimated the labor components of all materials used in production of each of these products.

3. The third phase dealt with the estimated labor component of depreciation in each of the six industries. In addition, it established estimates of the labor component of indirect depreciation considered as part of the cost of materials purchased by each of the six industries.

4. The fourth phase made estimates of the labor component of all taxes paid to Federal, State, and local governments. This consisted in determining the relative portion of these taxes distributed as wages and salaries to Government workers, and in estimated indirect labor component of goods and services purchased by these three levels of government.

The final answer for each of the six products thus includes (1) an allocation of some part of the cost of materials for the production of motor vehicles, machinery, etc., the indirect labor; (2) the further allocation of some part of depreciation cost—which in effect is payment for past purchases of goods and services having a labor component—to indirect labor; and (3) the allocation of some part of taxes paid by each industry to indirect labor.

DECENTRALIZATION PROGRAM—WRIGHT-PATTERSON AIR FORCE BASE, OHIO

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the special order just granted to me be vacated, and that I have permission to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, it will be recalled that on April 8 I called attention of the Members of the House to information I had received regarding the intention of the USAF to move management of various rocket programs from WPAFB, near Dayton, Ohio, to Edwards Air Force Base in California, and requested appropriate committees of the House to make a proper inquiry into this matter.

Permit me to again refer to my comments on April 8, Mr. Speaker, when I specifically pointed out that "I have no selfish motives in opposing such a move but do so only in the interest of national defense."

Mr. Speaker, when I was home during the Easter recess of the Congress, I was deeply impressed by the widespread concern of people generally relative to the adequacy and needs of our defense forces to provide for our national safety and welfare. I was just as deeply impressed, Mr. Speaker, with the complete confidence expressed by thoughtful people throughout the Third District of Ohio in the understanding, knowledge, and expertness of President Eisenhower in all such matters. These people are perfectly willing to accept the President's judgment as to the kind, size, extent, and direction of our defense forces.

Thinking people also realize, Mr. Speaker, that with the ever-changing complexity of technological improvements in weapons and weapon systems costs are inevitably higher. They have expressed their willingness, Mr. Speaker, to bear these high defense costs, but they also insist, and rightly so, I feel, that every effort must be made to secure the greatest possible efficiency in the expenditure of defense funds and that waste be reduced wherever it can be found.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the entire basis for my calling attention to the proposed move of the management of the rocket programs from Wright Air Development Command located at WPAFB to Edwards Air Force Base. I brought my remarks to the attention of the Honorable CARL VINSON, chairman, House Committee on Armed Services. Chairman VINSON, in accordance with his deep personal interest in all such matters, and in accordance with his always complete readiness to cooperate with all other Members of the House in all proper matters, gave this question his immediate attention and wrote to me under date of April 11. Chairman VINSON's letter said, in part:

> I am today making inquiry of the Air Force concerning this matter, requesting that a full explanation be made to me. As soon as I have received the report I will again contact you.

Mr. Speaker, under date of April 16, 1959, Jack Jones, staff writer for the Dayton Daily News, wrote a very revealing story which was published in the Dayton Daily News of that date. Under unanimous consent, I include this story as written by Mr. Jones as a part of these remarks:

ROCKET UNIT TO TAKE OFF

Employees in the rocket division of Wright Air Development Center's propulsion laboratory have been notified that their jobs are being transferred away from Wright-Patterson Air Force Base, it was learned today. Meanwhile WADC officials said they had received no official word on the status of the reported move.

WADC officials less than 2 weeks ago had denied that there were any plans for moving the rocket research group from the base here. Then a week ago, they admitted that plans were in the talking stage at Air Research and Development Command Headquarters at Andrews AFB, Md. It is expected that the unit will be transferred to Edwards AFB, Calif. Reports are that some 200 of the laboratory's 700 employees may be affected.

Mr. Speaker, I have known Jack Jones for many years and know him to be a very able reporter and one who bases his stories on the facts as he is able to learn them.

I am shocked and disturbed by the contents of this story, Mr. Speaker, because of the apparent unconcern of topside brass for either efficiency or costs.

These rocket programs, Mr. Speaker, I am told by knowledgeable people, are of tremendous importance in the overall interest of our national security. Any interruption in their management and production, it appears, could cause serious concern. Also the uprooting of highly trained scientific personnel could easily cause these people to seek other employment where their residence would not be so likely to be changed for some whim. Not only is this unnecessary delay and interruption of such programs of vital concern, but increased costs will most surely result. This has happened, Mr. Speaker, according the best information I have been able to obtain, on numerous programs where similar changes have been ordered. Thus it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that those in positions of responsibility in the Department of Defense should be required to completely justify their actions before the appropriate committees of the Congress, including the Committee on Armed Services and the Committee on Appropriations before any such contemplated changes are consumated. All of us, Mr. Speaker, are being constantly urged by well informed citizens to reduce the cost of our Federal Government where such savings can be made without adversely affecting our national safety and essential services. This cannot be done, Mr. Speaker, if the Congress constantly yields to the apparently insatiable demands of an always expanding Federal bureaucracy.

It is my firm conviction, Mr. Speaker, that each and every one of us must make every effort to insist upon efficiency and economy in each and every operation of our Federal Government. This is important not only in the interest of our national safety and security during these times of worldwide tensions, but it is also important to the future economic stability of our Nation.

It is my earnest hope, Mr. Speaker, that those in charge of our military programs as well as those in charge of our civilian service programs which are almost without number, will somehow achieve an awareness of their responsibilities and will consider the welfare of our entire Nation above any personal desire for position or power. We, as Members of the Congress, Mr. Speaker, owe our most sincere, continuing and earnest efforts, not only to our constituents and the entire Nation, but to the generations yet unborn to the end that this Nation will continue to be the greatest place in the world in which to live and a Nation where the freedoms that have been won at such high cost will continue through time and future. It is also my hope, Mr. Speaker, that the incident to which these remarks are addressed along with any future similar ideas will be given the most thorough and proper consideration by the appropriate committees, Members of the Congress, and all officials in positions of Federal responsibility.

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary may sit during general debate this week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SPECIAL ORDER

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the special order granted to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DENT] for tomorrow may be transferred to Tuesday, April 28.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE LATE ANTHONY P. DEMMA

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives, and particularly its press gallery, lost a most valuable public servant during the past year.

Anthony P. Demma, a gentleman of deep faiths, known to many of us as "Tony," died last October 3 after a brief and unexpected illness. Had he lived, he would have been 61 years old today.

Tony Demma had been assistant superintendent of the press gallery since 1934. He had been a fixture in the gallery since 1912 and had acquired a circle of friends of whom anyone could be proud. He was plain "Tony" to everyone who knew him, including Presidents Taft, Wilson, Hoover, Harding, Coolidge, Roosevelt, and Truman. He attended to the professional and personal needs of our friends in the press gallery with zeal and efficiency.

Tony Demma was only 10 years old when he got the smell of printer's ink as a copy boy for the old Washington Times. Subsequently he worked for the United Press, the Baltimore Sun, and Western Union, acquiring a firsthand knowledge of the newspaper profession. His "firsts" on the news wires included Woodrow Wilson's "war message" in April 1917, and the drawing of the first draft number by Secretary of War Newton D. Baker in World War I.

He was an ardent sportsman, his first love being baseball. He played with and managed the press gallery ball teams in their annual games with the congressional teams.

We who knew him miss Tony and his cheerful presence. Not often does a man of such character, such energy and such devotion to duty come along.

CONSENT CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. This is Consent Calendar day. The Clerk will call the first bill on the calendar.

CENTENNIAL OF THE ESTABLISHMENT OF LAND-GRANT COLLEGES AND STATE UNIVERSITIES

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 4012) to provide for the centennial celebration of the establishment of the land-grant colleges and State universities and the establishment of the Department of Agriculture, and for related purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask a member of the committee several questions concerning proposed amendments. May we have the proposed amendments discussed in connection with the intention, if the bill is considered and the amendments offered?

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, the proposed amendments cover a limit on the appropriations which may not be exceeded. They will include the traveling and other expenses of this Commission as far as the appropriation is concerned.

Mr. FORD. In other words, there will be a total ceiling available or authorized for this ceremony of $200,000?

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Yes, sir.

Mr. FORD. Can there be a clear understanding with the proponents of this legislation that the $200,000 is to be the total amount, with no second request thereafter?

Mr. KASTENMEIER. That is correct.

Mr. FORD. May we understand also that if this legislation is approved with the amendments that all expenses incurred will be handled out of the $200,000, and I refer to all Federal expenses, of course.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Yes. All such expenses would be paid out of these funds.

Mr. FORD. There would be no burden placed on the individual departments that do cooperate?

Mr. KASTENMEIER. No, except to this extent, and I read from a letter written by the Department of Agriculture:

In view of the widespread interest in and significance of the centennial celebrations throughout the country, it is anticipated that various entities will participate in the celebrations, including civic bodies, interested farm and educational organizations, and individuals, as well as State and Federal governmental agencies.

To that extent the Department of Agriculture, for example, will participate in the project, and it will do so through the use of its regular resources and facilities and as a part of its functional responsibilities.

Mr. FORD. These amendments will be offered if the bill is considered?

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Yes.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. I thought this was a $100,000 appropriation. Is it a $200,000 appropriation?

Mr. KASTENMEIER. It is $200,000.

Mr. FORD. It is a $200,000 authorization.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. It is an authorization, and that is the top limit.

Mr. GROSS. Then is it broken down into $100,000 for one purpose and $100,000 for another purpose? What is the story?

Mr. KASTENMEIER. No.

Mr. GROSS. It is a total authorization of $200,000?

Mr. KASTENMEIER. The gentleman is correct.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Whereas May 15, 1962, marks the centennial of legislation establishing the United States Department of Agriculture; and

Whereas July 2, 1962, marks the centennial of legislation providing for the establishment of the national system of land-grant colleges and State universities; and

Whereas American agriculture is basic to our free economy, and

Whereas the research, service, and educational work of the United States Department of Agriculture has over the years resulted in great benefits to the American people through increased efficiency in the production, utilization, and marketing of agriculture products essential to the health and welfare of our people and through the promotion of a sound and prosperous agriculture and rural life indispensable to the maintenance of maximum employment and national prosperity; and

Whereas the national system of land-grant colleges and universities, has fully justified the hope of its founders and now contributes annually more than half the Nation's trained scientists and nearly half the Regular and Reserve officers for its defense forces, and enrolls approximately one-fifth of all students in degree-granting colleges of the Nation; and

Whereas the United States Department of Agriculture and the land-grant colleges and State universities have historically maintained, and currently maintain, close cooperative relationships; and

Whereas it is appropriate that there be national recognition of and participation in the celebrations of the centennial of these two historic Acts of Congress jointly and separately by the Department of Agriculture and the American Association of Land-Grant Colleges and State Universities: Therefore

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it is deemed fitting and proper to commemorate the one hundredth anniversary of the establishment of the land-grant college system by the first Morrill Act, approved July 2, 1862, granting public lands to the States and Territories in support of colleges to emphasize branches of learning relating to agriculture and mechanical arts including other scientific and classical studies and military tactics, and the one hundredth anniversary of the Act of May 15, 1862, establishing the United States Department of Agriculture, and in addition to celebrate jointly such anniversaries of these events.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point the letter of the Department of Agriculture previously referred to, dated April 14, 1959.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, April 14, 1959.

Hon. EMANUEL CELLER,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary,
House of Representatives.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN CELLER: On January 29, 1959, this Department transmitted to the Congress proposed legislation for centennial celebrations of the establishment of this Department and the land-grant colleges and State universities. The proposal was introduced as H.R. 4012 and reported favorably by your committee.

In view of questions recently raised on the floor of the House during consideration of the Consent Calendar, we should like to make clear that the $200,000 authorization would be for the expenses of the Commission and would not include expenses of the cooperating agencies.

In view of the widespread interest in and significance of the centennial celebrations throughout the country, it is anticipated that various entities will participate in the celebrations, including civic bodies, interested farm and educational organizations, and individuals, as well as State and Federal governmental agencies. To the extent that the Department of Agriculture, for example, will participate in the project, it will do so through the use of its regular resources and facilities and as a part of its functional responsibilities.

The work of the Commission will be to coordinate the efforts of the cooperating entities and to arrange for proper and well-balanced participation by the groups involved. We believe the Commission will make the project more meaningful, more efficient, and more economical.

Sincerely yours,

E. L. PETERSON,
Assistant Secretary.

PRIVATE CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the bills on the Private Calendar will be called.

MRS ELBA HAVERSTICK CASH

The Clerk called the first bill on the Private Calendar, H.R. 1434, for the relief of Mrs. Elba Haverstick Cash.

Mr. AVERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. HAYS. I would just like to say that the reason for this committee amendment increasing the number was because we found that by doing this we could avoid going back to the House in about a year and a half or so to request additional copies. Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GROSS. Is this "for" or "agin" foreign aid—this document?

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, I would say to the gentleman that the committee thrashed this matter out pretty conclusively and we considered it to be a very objective document. I would say from my own observation that if it leans in either direction; it probably leans slightly against it, although I think it is very important. The reason I am for it is because it has in it a supply of information that I have never seen or been able to get gathered together in any one place before, relating to the amounts that we have contributed to various countries over the years and the various types of foreign aid.

Mr. GROSS. This is not that document that was printed last year with questions and self-serving answers by the Department of State?

Mr. HAYS. No; this was printed at the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. LIPSCOMB] and a group of his colleagues, to give them information which would guide them in their consideration of foreign aid legislation. They thought it was worthwhile and asked to have it printed. The committee evaluated it and thought it would be valuable to the membership.

HON. CHRISTIAN HERTER

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, the news of the resignation of Secretary of State, John Foster Dulles, saddened me, as I know it did all of us. When I first heard the announcement, immediately after my return from Geneva, where I had the honor to serve as a member of the 10th meeting of the Council of the Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration, I also felt a sense of trepidation concerning the future course and conduct of our foreign policy. That has been allayed by the announcement of the appointment of Christian Herter as Mr. Dulles' successor.

In years past we have grown accustomed to the continuous vaporings of the chorus of Dulles detractors—both domestic and foreign. I do not know what actuated them or caused them to persist in their attempts to undermine our Secretary of State and the conduct of our foreign policy. But how their tune has changed now that they know that almighty providence has caused the target of their attacks to lay down his heavy burden. Not in my memory, Mr. Speaker, do I recall such a complete about-face on the part of the newspaper and radio pundits—both here and abroad—in so short a time in their evaluation of a man and the policies he espoused.

Perhaps we should be charitable and compare these critics to the resentful child who chafed under the benign discipline of a devoted parent and then awoke to the frightening realization that the source of his irritation had been removed by the intervention of providence and that he now was on his own in a cruel and hostile world.

One of the charges most frequently leveled at Secretary Dulles by his detractors was that he was not popular abroad. I say again, Mr. Speaker, as I said some time ago in this Chamber, that when we evaluate the competence of a Secretary of State in proportion to his popularity abroad we will indeed be setting up the most dangerous, the most unrealistic of criteria. Paraphrasing Desdemona, I say now, as I said then, of Mr. Dulles: "I love him for the enemies he has made."

John Foster Dulles is a man of prodigious courage and determination who can face unflinchingly physical suffering. However, the mental torment of being unable to see through his policies or to participate in the crucial negotiations immediately ahead and his concern for the security and welfare of our Nation in the parlous times which face us must be for him a heavy burden indeed.

Few men in the history of our Nation have been such consummate practitioners of the art of diplomacy as Secretary Dulles. Few, if indeed any, have, through resolute determination, prophetic foresight, penetrating analysis and rigid adherence to the natural law been able to follow so unswervingly a predetermined course or to achieve so large a measure of their objective.

There are international politicians—I would not, Mr. Speaker, call them statesmen—who contend that in the relations between powers there is no morality; that the only law is self-interest, and that whatever any government, whether dictatorship or democracy, determines is in its own self-interest is indeed moral. Such a course of action, predicated on subjective norms and self-interest, must lead inevitably to a clash of nations, which may vary in degree from a cold war to a nuclear holocaust. Repeatedly in his public utterances Secretary Dulles proclaimed as the only true norm for the conduct of nations the rule of law; the objective, immutable norm of the moral law of man predicated upon the natural law of God. We shall see no true peace on earth until nations accept and abide by this principle. If he rendered no other single service to the comity of international relations, this contribution alone would entitle John Foster Dulles to be remembered as long as nations exist.

I feel a deep personal sadness at Secretary Dulles' misfortune as any of us would feel for a friend whom we greatly admire. I pray God that He may spare to us this great, this good and courageous, this deeply religious man for many years to come. His advice and counsel can be invaluable to any President or any administration. I also hope, Mr. Speaker, that he may be spared to write his memoirs, to fill the gaps of history and to pass on to future generations of Americans his great wisdom and knowledge concerning the conduct of foreign affairs and the practice of the art of diplomacy.

Mr. Speaker, I am certain that those of our colleagues who had the pleasure of serving in this body with Christian Herter share my pleasure and satisfaction in knowing that he has been appointed to the great office of Secretary of State of the United States at this most crucial moment.

Mr. Herter has proved himself in many fields. Since his early youth he has had a keen and continuing interest in foreign affairs. He knows and is liked by people, as is evidenced by the fact that he served in the 78th, 79th, 80th, 81st, and 82d Congresses. Subsequently he was chosen by the people of Massachusetts as the chief executive of that great Commonwealth. He is forceful; he is a leader and he can project his personality and his thoughts. But also he is kind, courteous, accommodating and respectful of the opinions of others. He can and will represent us well at the international conference tables. His background, experience and achievements preeminently qualify him for the great responsibilities which now face him.

It is with pleasure that I remember my service on the Select Committee on Foreign Aid of the 80th Congress, on which I served with Governor Herter. In later years that group came to be popularly known as the Herter Committee. I like to believe that that group was, in a measure, instrumental in having the Congress adopt the first and succeeding Marshall plans, the Truman doctrine and other measures which stopped the onward rush of communism in Europe and restored to a position of economic independence the free countries of the European Continent. I have seen with my own eyes, year by year, the results of those programs in Europe and I am keenly aware of the contribution which they have made to NATO and to the defense of the West. I also like to believe that we can, to a degree, share with President Truman and his great Secretary of State, General Marshall, the credit for the vision which inspired these programs. Certainly, Christian Herter was one of the principal architects of this edifice of defense. I salute him for his leadership and his foresight.

Mr. Speaker, I read with interest the remarks of some of the distinguished leaders of my party in the other body, when the appointment of Christian Herter as Secretary of State first was thought likely. They commended his qualifications for this high office and offered nonpartisan support. I think that we, too, believe that partisan politics should stop at the water's edge. I hope that I speak for my colleagues in promising Chris Herter the same nonpartisan support which was accorded his predecessor. I firmly believe that he will have the trust, the support and the prayers of all patriotic Americans as he now assumes the heavy burdens so recently and so tragically relinquished by Secretary Dulles and moves forward to the difficult days ahead. I wish him success in all he undertakes.

HELPING DEPENDENT CHILDREN OF AN UNEMPLOYED FATHER

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced an amendment to the Social Security Act which would broaden the Federal grant-in-aid program to provide assistance to needy children when the father is unemployed.

The amendment takes the form of a very simple change in section 406(a) of the Social Security Act. By adding the word "unemployment" in this section, State welfare agencies would be able to modify their existing State aid to dependent children programs to extend aid to families with children when the father was unemployed.

At the present time, Federal funds are available to the States under the aid to dependent children program only when a child is needy due to the "death, continued absence from the home, or physical or mental incapacity" of a parent—section 406(a) of the Social Security Act. As a result, the law places a premium on desertion. If, when a father is unemployed, and he needs public assistance, he cannot receive it in some localities—unless he deserts his family. When he deserts, his family can become eligible for Aid to Dependent Children.

Nobody knows, of course, how many such forced desertions occur, because when the mother applies for aid to dependent children the father has already left the family and it is then impossible to find out what motivated his action. But we can be reasonably certain that the Federal law, in its present form, puts pressure on the father to desert if he wishes to see his children and wife fed and sheltered. It necessitates that the father face the dilemma—stay with his family and perhaps all starve—or desert and give them a meager assistance until he can find a job elsewhere and come back for them or bring them to his new location.

Whatever may be the cost, I do not believe it is sound public policy for our Federal legislation to encourage, accept, or condone desertion. Consequently, I shall press for favorable action for my amendment and I earnestly solicit the support of members of the Committee on Ways and Means for my amendment.

Every State in the Union has an aid to dependent children program which is receiving Federal grants-in-aid under title IV of the Social Security Act. In January 1959 the average monthly payment per recipient was only $28.35—less than a dollar per day. Each State is free to decide the amount to be paid to the recipients and the standards to be set. But the Federal law determines the scope of coverage. This is something we can and must correct in the Federal law.

Numerous organizations have urged the Congress to broaden the coverage of the Aid to Dependent Children program. Among those advocating such a change are the American Public Welfare Association, the National Association of Social Workers, the AFL–CIO, the American Parents' Committee, and other organizations interested in children and families.

I particularly wish to cite two goals stated by the American Public Welfare Association in its "Federal Legislative Objectives—1959." These seem to me to be a sound basis for evaluating and supporting my amendment. Here is what the APWA says:

> Public welfare programs should provide effective services to all who require them including financial assistance and preventive, protective, and rehabilitative services, and these services should be available to all persons without regard to residence, settlement, or citizenship requirements;
> Democracy has a special obligation to assure to all the Nation's children full and equitable opportunity for family life, healthy growth, and maximum utilization of their potentialities.

Our present Aid to Dependent Children program does not accord with these objectives. We should not be content to allow the situation to remain the way it is. We need a change in the scope of the program.

As a member of the Intergovernmental Relations Subcommittee of the Committee on Government Operations, I had the opportunity to study State programs of public assistance. I came to the conclusion, from our studies, that both our unemployment insurance and public assistance programs need strengthening. The experience during the recession confirms this.

The amendment I have introduced would help the States to be in a better position to meet unemployment when it occurs. But even more so, it would be another step in the direction of helping "to maintain and strengthen family life." This objective was written into the Aid to Dependent Children provisions of the Social Security Act by Congress in 1956 in sections 401, 402(a)(11) and 403(a)(2). My amendment will help carry out this objective by keeping families together and helping them to get back on their feet when unemployment is a cause of need.

Mr. President, I believe it would be desirable to broaden the Aid to Dependent Children program so that any needy child could be given assistance in his own home. As a step in this direction, we should broaden the program now to include unemployment as an eligibility condition. We should give the States the opportunity to do so now while the lessons of the recession are still fresh in our mind.

From information received from State welfare directors, I believe that many States could take advantage of my amendment immediately without any further State legislation. Other States are eager and willing to do so as soon as the Federal law is changed.

Congress should take prompt action on this important matter.

WELFARE AND RECREATION AGENCIES SHOULD BE ELIGIBLE FOR FEDERAL SURPLUS PROPERTY

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, the disposal of surplus property to medical institutions, health centers, schools, colleges, and related organizations has proven of enormous benefit to institutions in South Dakota as well as throughout the country. Good use has been made of this property, especially by our schools and colleges. During the past year, about 80 percent of all surplus personal property was distributed to schools, about 10 percent to hospital and health facilities, and 10 percent for civil defense purposes.

The present Federal Property and Administrative Act of 1949 should be amended, however, to include worthy welfare and recreational agencies. These agencies which deal specifically with our aged, our young people, and our needy are doing a tremendous job—generally with very limited funds. They need this property and can put it to good use in the building of a stronger America.

The proposed bill would broaden eligibility to include agencies such as the Salvation Army, YMCA, YWCA, Travelers Aid, and other similar organizations. The bill insures that only tax-supported or tax-exempt welfare or recreational agencies would be eligible for this property. A tax-exempt voluntary agency would have to have a license from a State standard-setting agency, or receive funds through a State or local community fund, or be affiliated with or a part of a national standard-setting organization.

The bill has grown out of recommendations drawn up by a national welfare assembly committee, which included members drawn from American Foundation for the Blind, Child Welfare League of America, Council of Jewish Federations and Welfare Funds, Council on Social Work Education, Girl Scouts, National Council of Churches of Christ in America, National Federation of Settlements and Neighborhood Centers, National Jewish Welfare Board, National Recreational Association, Salvation Army, United Community Funds and Councils, Young Men's Christian Association, and Young Women's Christian Association. In addition, the following organizations have expressed their interest in this subject: American Hearing Society, Board of Hospitals and Homes of the Methodist Church, National Catholic Community Service, the United HIAS Service.

Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing legislation to amend the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 to authorize the disposal of surplus property to certain welfare agencies. Similar legislation has previously been introduced by Senator KEATING of New York and Senator WILEY of Wisconsin.

FOOD FOR PEACE ACT OF 1959

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, during the 6 years that I have been active in public life there is no theme that I have discussed so frequently as the necessity of using our agricultural abundance more effectively in feeding the hungry both at home and abroad.

It has always seemed strange to me for men to talk about "burdensome surpluses" of food in a world where most of the people do not have enough to eat.

For the past 2,000 years the world has been ennobled by the philosophy that out of our abundance we should feed the hungry and clothe the naked. This philosophy is not only good religious doctrine, it is sound economics and good politics.

At a time when we are engaged in a global competition with another way of life, it is all the more urgent that we use our resources to move the world toward peace and security. The only war that Americans seek is the war against hunger, poverty, and disease. A powerful instrument in that war is the abundant production of the American farmer. Instead of regarding our agricultural productivity as a curse, we should move with greater vision and compassion to convert it to the tremendous asset that it actually is. Instead of hiding our talent in the ground or letting it deterioriate in storage bins at public expense, let us move boldly into a comprehensive food for peace program.

On January 29 of this year I introduced House Concurrent Resolution 60 expressing the sense of the Congress that "the American people must more fully and completely employ the plentiful resources of the American farmer to enhance the standard of living throughout the free world and to bolster the political and economic stability of those nations which have embarked upon programs of economic construction."

The text of that resolution reads as follows:

Whereas the abundance of food and fiber produced by the American farmer is the marvel of the world; and

Whereas most of the people of the world are undernourished; and

Whereas the American people historically have been concerned with the well-being of other peoples; and

Whereas in many nations of the free world vital economic development programs are retarded and political stability is threatened by an inadequate supply of food; and

Whereas the remarkable bounty of the free American farmer has resulted in accumulations of farm commodities for which there is insufficient domestic demand; and

Whereas the Congress seeks to reduce unnecessary expenditures, including, where possible, those for commodity storage and for foreign assistance; and

Whereas the Soviet bloc has publicly challenged the United States and her allies to economic competition in demonstrating before the world the viability of their respective economic systems: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the sense of Congress that an agricultural abundance is one of America's greatest assets for raising living standards and promoting peace and stability in the free world; and that Congress favors action to resolve the paradox of American agricultural surpluses and world food needs by more fully utilizing the resources of the American farmer as an integral part of the United States' foreign assistance program.

SEC. 2. This concurrent resolution may be cited as the "Food for Peace Resolution."

I am today introducing a comprehensive legislative proposal to put the above resolution into operation.

My bill, which may be cited as "The Food for Peace Act" is similar to legislation being sponsored by Senator HUMPHREY in the other body.

The basic provisions of the act are the following:

TITLE I

The $1½ billion annual sales of farm surplus for foreign currencies would be increased to $2 billion annually and would be extended for 5 years.

TITLE II

The Public Law 480 title II provision of surplus food grants to meet famine or emergency conditions abroad would be extended for 5 years. Food grants to assist friendly countries in the relief of chronic hunger are also provided.

TITLE III

Continuation of title III of Public Law 480 including encouragement of church and other voluntary groups that have been distributing surplus food stocks to needy persons overseas. This section provides for, first, use by Federal agencies of local currencies derived from surplus commodity sales to purchase commodities not produced in the United States; second, barter of surplus agricultural commodities for strategic or other materials; third, grants of surplus farm stocks to public and private agencies for use in the United States in nonprofit school lunch programs, nonprofit summer camps for children, charitable institutions including hospitals, and assistance to needy persons; and fourth, grants to nonprofit voluntary agencies for use in the assistance of needy persons outside the United States.

TITLE IV

A 10-year program of long-term supply contracts for U.S. surplus agricultural commodities that would be financed with low-cost loans extending up to 40 years and at interest rates not exceeding 2½ percent. The borrowing countries would be permitted to retire the loans in dollars, services, or needed materials.

TITLE V

Grants of surplus agricultural commodities over a period of 5 years to help food-deficit countries, under agreements, build up and maintain minimum national food reserves—in accordance with the United States-sponsored resolution adopted by the United Nations on February 20, 1957.

TITLE VI

Negotiation of agreements with friendly countries to establish in such countries binational, nonprofit foundations to foster and promote research, education, health and public welfare, and to grant to such foundations unexpended local currencies which accrue to the United States as repayments of principal or payment of interest on local currency loans heretofore made by the United States under Public Law 480 or made hereafter under the Food for Peace Act.

TITLE VII

A Peace Food Administration would be established in the Executive Office of the President, headed by a Peace Food Administrator, to aid the President in carrying out the purposes of the act and also the purpose of section 402 of the Mutual Security Act of 1954, as amended. There would also be created an Interdepartmental Peace Food Policy Committee to advise and consult with the Peace Food Administrator, and also a Peace Food Advisory Committee consisting of representatives of private U.S. groups and organizations.

In addition to the foregoing, the Food for Peace Act would authorize a number of additions to the authorized uses, in addition to those in Public Law 480, for local currencies accruing from sales of surplus agricultural commodities under title I. Of these, five would permit the use of such currencies to buttress and extend social and economic development projects and activities of the United Nations Special Fund, the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization, the World Health Organization, the International Finance Corporation, and an International Development Loan Association if and when such may be established. Others would permit more effective use of such currencies in promoting international educational exchanges; research, educational development, and health and education; and technical assistance. On loans of local currencies for economic development, the act would specify a maximum interest rate of 2½ percent.

Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent I include the text of the bill at this point in the RECORD:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Public Law 480 of the Eighty-third Congress, as amended, is further amended as follows:

(1) The first section (which provides the short title) is amended to read as follows:

"That this Act may be cited as 'The International Food for Peace Act of 1959'."

(2) Section 2 (which consists of a statement of policy) is amended to read as follows:

"CONGRESSIONAL FINDINGS AND POLICY

"SEC. 2. (a) Because of the increased productivity made possible by science and technology, there is now, for the first time in history, no reason in physical scarcity for the continued existence of hunger—anywhere on this earth. It is now possible and practical for mankind to take cooperative steps to abolish human hunger.

"This being so, massive hunger and suffering from want of clothing, existing in the world in the shadow of unused present and potential surpluses of food and fiber, are no longer tolerable, either morally, politically, or economically.

"The Congress, while recognizing the difficult international, political, and economic problems that lie between hunger and want of clothing in many parts of the world and food and fiber surpluses in others, declares it to be the policy of the United States to move as rapidly as possible in cooperation with other friendly nations, toward putting its abundance of food and fiber more effectively in the service of human need.

"(b) Peoples who comprise one-third of the human race have in our generation achieved national independence (or are in the process of doing so) and are in revolt against the poverty, ignorance, disease, inferior status, and lack of opportunity which have always been their lot. They are determined to achieve that economic and social development necessary to national dignity and individual well-being. To mobilize their resources with reasonable speed and develop their economies to a point where they are self-propelled and self-sustaining they require substantial outside aid over a considerable period of years. If that aid is adequately forthcoming from the free world, they have a good chance to accomplish their purposes in freedom, remaining a part of the free world and contributing to its strength and well-being. If it is not forthcoming, their alternative is to seek it in the Communist world, and in the process to surrender both personal and national freedom. Deeply aware of and sympathetic with the aspirations of the world's peoples who seek in freedom greater national dignity and individual well-being, the Congress declares it to be the policy of the United States to help them achieve those aspirations. The Congress recognizes that for this purpose a number of different kinds of aid are required, but that among them food and fiber aid is a highly important form and one whose effectiveness can be greatly increased. The Congress declares that the agricultural abundance of the United States is not an embarrassment but a blessing to be used in the service of mankind, that it should be so used to the maximum extent possible, and that if it is so used it can help build essential conditions of world peace and freedom.

"(c) To achieve those larger purposes, the Congress directs that this Act shall be administered (1) so as to help other countries carry forward their own national or regional plans for development in freedom and independence; (2) so as to support the efforts and programs of the United Nations, its specialized agencies and affiliated organizations, and regional organizations of friendly countries, directed toward the same ends; (3) so as to leave wide latitude in working out details of national agreements and projects to United States Chiefs of Missions in negotiations with the governments concerned; and (4) so as to enlist the cooperation of other countries in putting agricultural surpluses more effectively in the service of human need and the economic and social development of less developed countries.

"(d) It is also declared to be the policy of Congress to expand international trade among the United States and friendly nations, to facilitate the convertibility of currency, to promote the economic stability of American agriculture, and the national welfare, to make maximum efficient use of surplus agricultural commodities in furtherance of the foreign policy of the United States, and to stimulate and facilitate the expansion of foreign trade in agricultural commodities produced in the United States by providing a means whereby surplus agricultural commodities in excess of the usual marketings of such commodities may be sold through private trade channels, and foreign currencies accepted in payment thereof. It is further the policy to use foreign currencies which accrue to the United States under this Act to expand international trade, to encourage economic development, to purchase strategic materials, to pay United States obligations abroad, to promote collective strength, and to foster in other ways the foreign policy of the United States."

(3) Section 101 (which relates to the negotiation of agreements) is amended by striking out "and" at the end of paragraph (d), by changing the period at the end of paragraph (e) to a semicolon, and by adding at the end of such section the following new paragraphs:

"(f) seek, insofar as possible, to enter into such agreements for periods in excess of one year; and

"(g) give maximum attention to utilizing the authority and funds provided by this Act to further the economic and social development plans of underdeveloped countries."

(4) Section 103(b) (prescribing limit on appropriations) is amended to read as follows:

"(b) Agreements shall not be entered into under this title during the period beginning July 1, 1959, and ending June 30, 1964, which will call for appropriations to reimburse the Commodity Credit Corporation, pursuant to subsection (a) of this section, in amounts in excess or $2,000,000,000 annually, plus any amount by which agreements entered into in prior years have called or will call for appropriations to reimburse the Commodity Credit Corporation in amounts less than authorized for such prior fiscal years by this Act as in effect during such fiscal years."

(5) Section 103 is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) In carrying out programs and activities under this title, the President shall, insofar as possible, coordinate such programs and activities with other United States and international programs and activities directed toward the same end."

(6) Section 104(e) (relating to loans for trade expansion) is amended by striking out "Export-Import Bank for loans mutually agreeable to said bank" and inserting in lieu thereof "United States Development Loan Fund created by title II of chapter II of the Mutual Security Act of 1954, as amended, for loans mutually agreeable to said Fund", and by inserting before the semicolon at the end thereof a colon and the following: "Provided further, That funds which have accrued under this section and which are uncommitted may at the discretion of the President, be placed under the administration of the Development Loan Fund".

(7) Section 104(g) (relating to the promotion of trade and economic development) is amended to read as follows:

"(g) For loans and grants to promote multilateral trade and economic development, made through established banking facilities of the friendly nation from which the foreign currency was obtained or in any other manner which the President may deem to be appropriate. Interest on loans made under this subsection shall be at such rate, not to exceed 2½ per centum per annum, as the President shall determine. Strategic materials, services, or foreign currencies may be accepted in payment of such loans;".

(8) Section 104(h) (relating to international educational exchange activities) is amended by striking out the words "in such amounts as may be specified from time to time in appropriation acts" and by striking out the semicolon at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof a period and the following: "Such currencies may also be used for making grants to United States nonprofit organizations and institutions for carrying out such exchange of persons projects under this paragraph between the United States and other countries as may be agreed upon between such organizations and institutions and the Secretary of State, but no such grants shall be made to any organization or institution which does not agree to provide the dollar funds which the Secretary of State deems necessary to carry forward agreed projects to a successful conclusion;".

(9) Section 104(k) (relating to scientific activities) is amended by striking out "but no foreign currencies shall be used for the purposes of this subsection (k) unless specific appropriations be made therefor" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "and to promote and support programs of medical and scientific research, cultural and educational development, health, nutrition, and sanitation".

(10) Section 104(o) (relating to assistance to educational facilities sponsored by United States citizens) is amended by striking out so much thereof as follows the semicolon.

(11) Section 104 (relating to uses of foreign currencies) is amended by inserting after paragraph (o) the following new paragraphs:

"(p) For supporting workshops in American studies or American educational techniques, and supporting chairs in American studies.

"(q) For financing technicians and other personnel of the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization and World Health Organization (including necessary equipment and supplies) engaged in (i) consulting and advising on, conducting, or administering Government programs designed to relieve chronic hunger and malnutrition, (ii) consulting and advising on programs for the storage, management, and operation of national food reserves, or (iii) training local technical, administrative, and other personnel needed to carry out such programs;

"(r) For financing research, surveys, conferences, publicity, and other activities which the President shall find to be helpful in support of the projected 'Free the World from Hunger' campaign of the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization; and for such purposes and the purposes of paragraph (q) any currencies of any country available under this Act may be transferred to and used in any other country;

"(s) For financing local currency cost components of projects undertaken by the United Nations Special Fund for which such Fund pays foreign exchange costs;

"(t) For contributions, in addition to United States dollar contributions, to the capital fund of any international development association or organization of which the United States is a member which may be established as an affiliate of the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development for the purpose of making long-term loans for economic development;

"(u) For financing the preparation, distribution, and exhibiting of audio-visual informational and educational materials, including Government materials, abroad;

"(v) For transfer to the International Finance Corporation for the purpose of promoting private investment abroad under such arrangement as may be agreed upon between the President, said Corporation, and the country whose currency is involved;

"(w) For financing the services of technicians, advisers, and administrators who are nationals of any friendly country, which may be needed to further economic and social development programs in other friendly countries;

"(x) For financing relief and rehabilitation projects undertaken following disasters or for assistance to refugees."

(12) Section 104 is further amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof a comma and the following: "and from time to time release for the general purposes of this title funds that may have accrued in excess of prospective needs for payment of United States obligations".

(13) Section 106 (which relates to determination of nations with which agreements shall be negotiated) is amended by striking out the words "Secretary of Agriculture" where they appear the second time and inserting in lieu thereof "President".

(14) Section 107 (which defines "friendly nation") is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof a colon and the following: "Provided, That such term shall not exclude any nation referred to in clause (2) if the President determines that the making and carrying out of agreements with such nation under this Act will be in the interest of attaining the foreign-policy objectives of the United States".

(15) Section 109 (which relates to the duration of the program under title I) is amended by striking out "December 31, 1959" and inserting in lieu thereof "June 30, 1964".

(16) Section 202 (authorizing grants of surplus commodities for famine relief) is amended by striking out "with friendly governments or through voluntary agencies" and inserting in lieu thereof "by or with friendly governments or voluntary relief agencies to carry out the purposes of section 201 and to assist friendly nations in establishing, expanding, or carrying out programs, including programs undertaken with the assistance of experts and technicians of the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization, and the World Health Organization for the relief of chronic hunger and malnutrition".

(17) Section 203 (which imposes limits on expenditures under title II) is amended by striking out the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Not more than $250,000,000, including the Corporation's investment in the commodities, shall be expanded annually for all such transfers and for other costs authorized by this title."

(18) Section 204 (which relates to the duration of the program under title II) is amended by striking out "December 31, 1959" and inserting in lieu thereof "June 30, 1964".

(19) Section 304(b) (which prohibits certain transactions with the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and areas dominated or controlled by the Communist regime in China) is amended by striking out "title I or title III" and inserting in lieu thereof "title I, title III, title IV, title V, or title VI".

(20) Title III is further amended by adding at the end thereof a new section as follows:

"SEC. 306. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Commodity Credit Corporation is hereby directed—

"(1) to dispose of its stocks of edible oils or products thereof by donation, upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of Agriculture deems appropriate, to nonprofit voluntary agencies registered with the Department of State, appropriate agencies of the Federal Government or international organizations, for use in the assistance of needy persons outside the United States;

"(2) to purchase for donation as provided above such quantities of edible oils and the products thereof as the Secretary determines will maintain the support level for cottonseed and soybeans without requiring the acquisition of such commodities under the price support program.

Commodity Credit Corporation may incur such additional costs with respect to commodities to be donated hereunder as it is authorized to incur with respect to food commodities disposed of under section 416 of the Agricultural Act of 1949, and may pay ocean freight charges from United States ports to designated ports of entry abroad."

(21) Such Act is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following new titles:

"TITLE IV—LONG TERM SUPPLY CONTRACTS

"SEC. 401. The purpose of this title is to utilize agricultural commodities and the products thereof produced in the United States, including but not limited to agricultural commodities in surplus supply, to assist the economic development of friendly nations by assuring such nations a stable supply of agricultural commodities on long-term credit for domestic consumption during periods of economic development so that the resources and manpower of such nations may be utilized more effectively for industrial and other domestic economic development without jeopardizing meanwhile adequate supplies of agricultural commodities for domestic use.

"SEC. 402. In furtherance of this purpose, the President is authorized to enter into agreements with friendly nations under the terms of which the United States shall undertake to deliver annually (a) certain quantities of wheat, rice, cotton, feed grains, or tobacco, or (b) such other surplus agricultural commodities as may from time to time be available, for periods of not to exceed ten years.

"SEC. 403. Payment for such commodities shall be in dollars or in services or in strategic or other materials of which the United States does not domestically produce its requirements, as the President may from time to time determine, with interest at such rate as the President may determine but not more than 2½ per centum per year. Payment may be made in approximately equal annual amounts over periods of not to exceed forty years from the date of the last delivery of commodities under the agreement and interest shall be computed from the date of such last delivery.

"SEC. 404. Any such agreement shall include the following undertakings on the part of the purchasing nation as conditions of such contract:

"(1) That commodities provided hereunder will not replace any usual imports of the same or similar commodities by such nation from friendly nations;

"(2) That commodities provided hereunder will be used only for domestic consumption and that none of such commodities will be sold outside the purchasing nation either directly or through replacement of domestic production.

"SEC. 405. In entering into such agreements, the President shall endeavor to reach agreement with other exporting nations of such commodities for their participation in the supply and assistance program herein authorized on a proportionate and equitable basis.

"SEC. 406. In carrying out this title, the provisions of sections 101, 102, 103(a), 106, 107, and 108 of this Act shall be applicable to the extent not inconsistent with this title.

"TITLE V—NATIONAL FOOD RESERVES

"SEC. 501. The President is authorized to implement the resolution adopted by the United Nations on February 20, 1957 (United Nations Resolution 1025 [XI]), which was sponsored by the United States, calling for international cooperation in the establishment of national food reserves by making transfers of surplus agricultural commodities for the purpose of establishing such reserves. The Commodity Credit Corporation shall make available to the President out of its stocks such agricultural commodities as he may request for this purpose.

"SEC. 502. In making transfers under this title, the President may provide for delivery f.o.b. vessels in United States ports and, upon a determination by the President that it is necessary to accomplish the purposes of such resolution, for the payment of ocean freight charges from United States ports to designated ports of entry abroad, and for furnishing of technical and other assistance in providing storage facilities for the food reserves so established.

NEW DIRECTIONS FOR FOREIGN ECONOMIC AID

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BOWLES] is recognized for 90 minutes.

Mr. BOWLES. Mr. Speaker, few subjects on the minds of the American people and the agenda of Congress are as important as foreign aid. And probably on no subject is there so much disagreement, misunderstanding, and frustration.

There have always been a number of hard-core opponents of foreign aid in the Congress. This year, as in the past, they will oppose the mutual security bill with vigor and skill.

What I find much more disturbing is the opposition of old friends of the program who are deeply concerned over the direction in which it has been moving.

When we add the frustration in this body created by threats of Presidential vetoes of such domestic programs as schools, area development, housing, and urban renewal—programs which many of us believe to be essential to the well-being of our own country—the danger of deep and dangerous retaliatory cuts in foreign aid becomes apparent.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that those of us who have supported this program from the beginning, and who believe that it is even more vitally needed today, have a special responsibility to explore the reasons for the present confusion and opposition and to propose positive steps that Congress can take to help clear the air.

I speak as such a supporter, who intends to vote for the full amount requested by the President.

WORKED WITH PROGRAM

I also speak from 14 years of varied experience in the planning and administrating of foreign aid programs both for the United Nations and our own Government.

As the U.S. Stabilization Director at the war's end, I was concerned with the planning of our relief food shipments to Europe and Asia.

As a U.S. delegate to the first UNESCO Conference in Paris in 1946, I participated in planning the initial programs of this new agency.

As special consultant to the Secretary General of the United Nations in 1947 and 1948, I surveyed and reported on United Nations child welfare assistance programs in France, Italy, Poland, Hungary, and Czechoslovakia.

As U.S. Ambassador to India and Nepal in 1951–53, I had direct responsibility for staffing, planning, and administering our own first major Point 4 effort. This included the launching of the world's first major community development program, a program that now embraces 320,000 Indian villages and 180 million people.

Since leaving India, Mr. Speaker, I have had continuing first-hand opportunities to study American and United Nations aid programs in Pakistan, Afghanistan, Vietnam, Burma, Indonesia, Thailand, Formosa, Korea, the Philippines, Ethiopia, and in several African countries and territories south of the Sahara.

I have seen the near miracles that can be accomplished in the villages when the right amount of technical assistance is fruitfully combined with small amounts of capital and the active, energetic participation of the local inhabitants.

I have seen the democratic lift, purpose, and pride that new industries, improved transportation, and expanding hydroelectric power can give to old societies.

I have also seen what can happen in terms of waste and frustration when American aid is spent in the wrong place, in the wrong way, and for the wrong reasons.

PROBLEMS INFINITELY COMPLEX

Experiences of this kind are bound to give any observer a profound awareness of the enormous complexities with which our foreign aid administrators must contend day after day. Intricate and delicate problems must be weighed and balanced. Assorted pressures of many kinds require the utmost in tact and perseverance.

May I add that my criticisms are not intended for any individual. I have developed the greatest respect and admiration for many of the hard-working and dedicated public servants who have administered our aid programs through the years. Mr. C. Douglas Dillon, Under Secretary of State, who now has general supervision over these programs, in particular is a man of unique competence and ability.

ERRORS WELL KNOWN

The fact remains that errors of omission and commission in our foreign aid programs are substantial and they have been well publicized. No doubt they will again be stressed with vigor in the coming debates.

Yet when our oratory has died away, this overall aid effort will remain absolutely and urgently essential to America's immediate and long-range interests and to our hopes of building a lasting peace. We simply cannot afford to carve up the aid program; much less can we afford to abandon it.

What we must do is to introduce standards that will help assure more realistic planning and administration, and at the same time frankly explain to the American people why foreign aid is needed, what it can do, and, equally important, what it cannot do.

Ultimately, Mr. Speaker, we shall need a better balance among various aid programs and perhaps additional international machinery. I merely refer in passing to certain developments which I should like to see happen but which I shall not discuss today.

For instance, I would prefer that a larger proportion of our technical assistance be channeled through the United Nations technical assistance program than is presently the case.

I would like to see Senator MONRONEY's proposal for an International Development Association given more serious consideration.

In our own mutual security program I would feel happier if we could separate economic from military assistance completely.

Finally, I would advocate more emphasis on long-term loan commitments to encourage more efficient planning and to discourage waste.

No man with a realistic appreciation of the circumstances of the moment, both in the administration and in the Congress, will feel there is a possibility for major thoroughgoing revision of the mutual security legislation this year.

Most of the suggestions I have just mentioned are unlikely to receive effective consideration during the present session of Congress. But this does not mean that we are powerless between now and adjournment to compel less expediency, less waste, less confusion, and, consequently, better performance.

FOUR CHANGES NEEDED

As a contribution to this essential, immediate strengthening of the program, I suggest the following four changes in the present legislation, which I believe it would be practicable to make in the mutual security authorization legislation this year:

First. A revised statement of the purposes of our aid legislation, which more positively reflects America's true, long-range objectives in world affairs.

Second. A set of standards that will help channel military assistance to those nations which have genuine need for such assistance to deter Communist aggression, and which will discourage arms shipments to countries where such shipments lead to internal instability and regional conflicts.

Third. A set of standards which will give high priority for technical assistance and development loans to nations which will demonstrate a willingness to sacrifice in their own behalf and whose governments are so organized that they can use our help with a minimum of waste.

Fourth. An increase in the Development Loan Fund to $1 billion annually. The additional $300 million can, I believe, be saved by a reasonable application of the standards I have suggested above.

I. NEEDED: A NEW STATEMENT OF PURPOSE

Mr. Speaker, I shall explain as briefly as I can the reasons for each of these proposals.

One of the principal reasons why we now face grave difficulties in securing adequate funds for foreign aid is the failure of the administration to explain honestly and frankly why it is so urgently needed.

Thus a reluctant Congress has been asked each year to support this effort for a variety of expedient reasons calculated to frighten or woo us into favorable, last-minute, emergency action.

Because many of these official reasons have turned out to be superficial and unrealistic, the American people have become increasingly confused and the Congress increasingly impatient.

I know of no greater tribute to our national intelligence than the public opinion polls which consistently show that nearly 70 percent of all Americans strongly support the foreign aid program in spite of their Government's failure to spell out its true, long-range objectives.

The official purposes which are now most often advanced for foreign aid are inadequate for several reasons.

They fail to do justice to America's real goals in world affairs.

They fail to appeal to the common concern for the dignity of man which we share with people all over the non-Communist world.

And they fail to take into account the intelligence and decency of the American people themselves.

A PREMIUM ON COMMUNISTS

The preamble to the Mutual Security Act now implies that it is "the policy of the United States to continue" the aid program only "as long as (the Communist) danger * * * persists."

Thus, for purposes of qualifying for American dollars, we have officially turned communism into a natural resource like oil or uranium. In the marketplace of the cold war, a noisy Communist minority has become worth its weight in gold.

The apocryphal account of a Monacan Foreign Minister's visit to Washington to secure $10 million in aid is well known in every world capital.

The arrangement was ready to be signed and sealed, so the story goes, when the American negotiator turned to the Monacan official and casually remarked: "I understand you have been having fearful trouble recently with your Communist agitators."

The Foreign Minister proudly replied that Monaco was almost free of Communists. The startled American official shook his head sadly. "Congress," he said, "will never stand for a grant of $10 million to a country with no Communists."

The disheartened Monacan official returned home by way of Paris and, as a last resort, called on the French Foreign Minister. After explaining his predicament, he asked if it might not be possible to borrow a few angry, window-breaking French Communists to help bolster Monaco's application for American aid.

His French counterpart looked at him soberly. "My friend," he finally said, "I am afraid we must refuse. Although France is anxious to be a good neighbor, we need every single Communist that we have."

As long as the preamble of the Mutual Security Act reads as it now reads, Communist agitators may logically say to their Asian, African, and Latin American audiences: "The Soviet Union offers you loans and technicians to speed your economic development. For this you are grateful.

"But should you not be equally grateful to Moscow for the aid you get from Washington?

"In their own official statement of purpose at the beginning of their mutual security legislation, the Americans frankly state that if they were not so frightened of us Communists, they would give you nothing."

CAN WE BUY FRIENDS?

Another supporting reason for the foreign aid program, which is often officially offered in discreet, off-the-record talks, is its alleged usefulness in buying majority support for our policies in the United Nations General Assembly.

But Mr. Speaker, is this second reason any more valid than the first?

Suppose a wealthy man came to live in a typical American community to finance a series of community improvements in return for public acceptance of his political views. Would not most upstanding, civic-minded people urge him to take his benefactions elsewhere?

Can we expect the proud new nations of Asia and Africa, and the older nations of Europe and Latin America to react differently?

WELL-FED COMMUNISTS?

A third mistaken argument for foreign assistance is that communism appeals only to hungry people. "Just fill everyone's stomach with rice," we sometimes hear, "and that will be the end of communism in the underdeveloped world."

This view reflects a massive lack of understanding of the Communist appeal and indeed of human nature. Frustrations which grow from injustice and the absence of a sense of belonging are far stronger motivations toward communism than pure hunger.

Indeed, if an Asian, African, or Latin American government is content to give its people food while refusing them the right to till their own land and to work democratically with their neighbors in creating better communities, the government may end up with a better fed, and therefore more dangerous, Communist minority than it had in the first place.

OUR EARLIER VISION

The objectives of American assistance have not always been advanced in such negative terms.

Consider, for instance, the breadth and vision of President Roosevelt's eloquent appeal to Congress and the American people in behalf of lend-lease in 1941, of Secretary Marshall's historic speech in 1947 at Harvard boldly spelling out the partnership relationships of the Marshall plan, of President Truman's Point 4 statement in his 1949 inaugural message proposing economic aid and technical assistance to the new underdeveloped nations.

In each case the objectives were magnificently positive, practical, and within our democratic tradition.

Nor did we rely alone on the eloquence of our Presidents and Secretaries of State to present America's true objectives to the world.

Year after year the Congress of the United States specifically wrote them into the preambles and statements of purpose of our foreign aid legislation.

For example, in the Foreign Assistance Act of 1948 the 80th Congress called for steps designed to strengthen "the principles of individual liberty, free institutions, and genuine independence, based upon a strong production effort, the expansion of foreign trade, the creation and maintenance of internal financial stability, and the development of economic cooperation."

In the Foreign Economic Assistance Act of 1950 the 81st Congress said:

> The peoples of the United States and other nations have a common interest in the freedom and in the economic and social progress of all peoples.
>
> The efforts of the peoples living in economically underdeveloped areas of the world to realize their full capabilities and to develop the resources of the lands in which they live can be furthered through the cooperative endeavor of all nations to exchange technical knowledge and skills and to encourage the flow of investment capital.
> It is declared to be the policy of the United States to aid the efforts of the peoples of economically underdeveloped areas to develop their resources and improve their working and living conditions by encouraging the exchange of technical knowledge and skills and the flow of investment capital to countries which provide conditions under which such technical assistance and capital can effectively and constructively contribute to raising standards of living, creating new sources of wealth, increasing productivity, and expanding purchasing power.
> It is further declared to be the policy of the United States that in order to achieve the most effective utilization of the resources of the United States, private and public, which are or may be available for aid in the development of economically underdeveloped areas, agencies of the U.S. Government, in reviewing requests of foreign governments for aid for such purposes, shall take into consideration whether the assistance applied for is an appropriate part of a program reasonably designed to contribute to the balanced and integrated development of the country or area concerned.

Against this background, Mr. Speaker, the 1954 statement of purpose retained in this year's bill, appears unworthy of us. Its implied motivations are negative, expedient, and unrealistic.

In this critical period in history, I believe we should stop underestimating the American people. It is time to put aside the sales gimmicks and to do what needs to be done for the right reasons.

WHY IS FOREIGN AID REALLY NEEDED?

The reasons why the mutual security legislation is essential to America's objectives can be simply stated:

In the last 15 years a political and economic revolution of extraordinary dimensions has swept Asia, Africa, and Latin America.

Seven-hundred million people have won their freedom from colonial rule. In spite of lack of capital, of technicians, and of administrative skills, they and their contemporaries in other underdeveloped nations are now working impatiently to grow more food, create new industries, and build a better future for their people.

The resulting situation is politically explosive for two reasons:

First. The utter poverty and slow pace of change in much of Asia, Africa, and of Latin America, contrasts sharply with the extraordinary wealth and economic growth of the privileged peoples of Western Europe, Canada, and the United States. This creates envy and frustration.

Second. Communism now offers the underdeveloped continents, not only the glittering Soviet example of a modern industrial nation created out of chaos in two generations, but substantial capital and large numbers of skilled technicians with which to make a similar transition. This offers harried new nationalist leaders a tempting shortcut.

Is it surprising, Mr. Speaker, to find the Soviet leaders now fishing in the politically troubled waters of Asia, Africa, and Latin America with such effectiveness?

SOVIET OBJECTIVE

The Kremlin's primary objective in its efforts toward world domination is to split the Western World with its 600 million highly skilled and industrialized people. This calls for the ultimate separation of Western Europe from America.

For nearly a generation the Soviet Union has been pursuing this objective by two different but related tactics.

First. Direct action against our NATO alliance such as the effort made in the late 1940's and in the present Soviet-generated crisis over Berlin.

Second. A flanking attack through the churning continents of Asia, Africa, and Latin America which contain the raw materials on which Europe's prosperity depends and where revolutionary change is now the order of the day.

Forty years ago Lenin said, "The road to Paris lies through Calcutta and Peiping." He believed that control over a sizable fraction of the resources of these rich continents would enable the world Communist movement eventually to break the back of heavily industrialized Europe.

Fortunately for the world Stalin lacked the capital, technicians, and understanding of peasant Asia to follow this approach effectively. But Khrushchev has the resources and the astuteness that Stalin lacked, and he is now using them both with vigor and skill.

WHAT DOES AMERICA WANT?

We have no desire to control the nations or the resources of Asia, Africa, and Latin America. We seek no satellites. We have no wish to impose our ways on others.

Indeed our own Nation was born in revolution and since our earliest days we have associated ourselves with the efforts of people everywhere to gain and maintain their freedom, and to create their own futures in their own way.

Thomas Jefferson once said that the "American Revolution is intended for all mankind."

Tom Paine spoke of the small spark kindled in America that could never be extinguished.

George Washington believed that the freedom of the world was "finally staked on the experiment attributed to the American people and remarked that he felt irresistibly excited whenever in any country I see an oppressed people unfurl the banner of freedom."

The American Revolution, Abraham Lincoln said, would eventually ease the lot of people on a great portion of the globe.

Moreover, America's role of leader in mankind's struggle for freedom was accepted and understood far beyond our shores. As he watched the new countries of Latin America throw off colonial rule with American assistance after the Napoleonic Wars, Austrian Foreign Minister Metternich complained that America is constantly "fostering revolutions wherever they show themselves, regretting those that fail, and extending a helping hand to those which succeed."

Our major purpose now as then is to encourage free peoples to stand on their own feet, to make their own choices, to defend themselves against overt aggression, and to create economic and political conditions under which the principles of liberty and human dignity can take root, grow, and ultimately flourish.

Our global objective remains what it was in Jefferson's time: a world of peace in which all men may have the opportunity to develop freely and independently within the framework of their own cultures, religions, and national capabilities.

That, Mr. Speaker, is why we need the Mutual Security Act now and that is why we will continue to need similar legislation for many years to come.

TIME TO DEFINE OUR OBJECTIVES

The time has come to give the American people and the world a positive indication that the objectives of our mutual security program are worthy of our historic political convictions and of our democratic beliefs.

In the absence of strong Administration leadership, the Congress cannot rewrite our foreign aid program as I believe it should be rewritten. But we can, if we will, give the program an identity and purpose that not only fits the urgency and the nature of our times but which also reflects the true, long-range, global objectives of the American people.

Mr. Speaker, my first proposal in regard to this year's mutual security bill is that we clearly spell out these objectives. I have indicated the directions in which such new language should point.

II. WHO SHOULD HAVE MILITARY AID?

Mr. Speaker, I shall now turn to my second proposed change.

I am impatient, and I believe others here are too, with the present wasteful, and often ineffective, methods of allocating some of our military assistance. In many cases we have inadvertently created situations which have played into the hands of the Communists and increased their influence.

I realize, of course, that in certain areas which are clearly threatened by Communist aggression, military considerations often must take precedence, at least for the short haul. Western Europe, Greece, Turkey, Yugoslavia, Korea, Formosa, and Vietnam, are all cases in point. Here substantial American military assistance remains absolutely essential.

But in two whole continents—South America and Africa, and in much of the vast arc of Asia that stretches from Lebanon to Manila—the principal threat to world peace comes not from Soviet tanks and jets but from economic strangulation, injustice, and human frustration.

AIDING DICTATORS

In these areas, haphazard shipments of American military equipment seldom coincide with our long-term security interests, much less with those of the people in the country concerned.

Such military assistance given on an expedient basis is almost invariably self-defeating. It adds to internal economic strains. It diverts internal efforts from constructive development. It paves the way for palace revolutions. In some cases it ties our prestige and our influence to the dubious tenure of dictatorships which are sooner or later destined to be swept aside.

Military assistance injected into these surging continents may be particularly harmful if it is given without proper regard for regional political considerations. By disrupting the delicate balance of power between a recipient nation and its non-Communist neighbors, indiscriminate arms shipments jeopardize the military and political stability of the entire area.

Internal economic factors must also be taken into account. I know of no more effective way to undermine a wobbly new government than to burden it unnecessarily with an excessive military load that prevents its leaders from focusing their attention on essential tasks like growing rice, driving out malaria and building schools, clinics, and roads.

The more arms we pour into such situations, the more we inflate the power of the military, the easier it is for ambitious officers to seize power and the further we stray from our essential democratic purposes.

Mr. Speaker, for all of these reasons, I believe it is essential that we reconsider on a country-by-country basis the effectiveness of our military assistance program.

We must determine precisely where we are heading with our military aid programs in Asia, Africa, and Latin America and establish more realistic standards for the granting of such assistance.

I do not propose that we recklessly repudiate old arrangements. But I believe we should insist that they be shaped to new objectives and that new agreements which fail to meet these standards should be ruled out.

III. STANDARDS FOR ECONOMIC AID

Let me now consider, Mr. Speaker, the need for a more realistic approach to the distribution of economic assistance.

Why is it that a dam can be built and operated with great success in one country, while in another country a similar dam is a miserable failure?

Why is it that modern equipment can make a vital contribution to increasing agricultural and small industrial productivity in the villages of some countries while similar machinery sent to other countries lies rusting on the docks?

DIFFERENCES AMONG RECIPIENTS

In most cases it reflects basic differences between the countries and the governments in question—differences which we have often lamentably failed to take into account.

The underdeveloped countries of the world fall into many categories.

The most favorable opportunities for American assistance exist in those countries which are not only determined to build solid economic and social foundations, but which also have the built-in capacity to implement their plans.

In such countries, which unhappily are too few in number, we should be prepared to make bolder and longer term investments of our capital and our skills.

At the other extreme are those nations which, because of lack of leadership, of administrative experience, or of courage to put through essential reforms, are clearly incapable of meeting the minimum practical requirements of rapid economic development under present conditions.

In such countries, experience demonstrates that long-term loans or investment grants for general economic development are wasteful and foolhardy.

Any effort to force the pace beyond their capacity to use the funds effectively will almost certainly fail, and failure will lead to frustration on our part and bitterness on theirs.

Between these extremes there are many variations which will require judgment and understanding.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest the following five standards to measure the capacity of each country to use our long-term economic development assistance. I believe they are both practical and urgently necessary.

FIVE STANDARDS FOR JUDGMENT

First. The most important standard for granting American economic loans and other assistance should be that of self-sacrifice.

To become eligible for substantial long-term assistance, a nation should demonstrate that it is making a substantial effort to finance its own national development from its own resources.

Evidence of this willingness for self-sacrifice should include a reasonably effective program of national taxation based on individual ability to pay, controls over the importation of luxuries and nonessentials which otherwise rapidly eat up foreign exchange, and a determined and continuing effort to assure the maximum number of peasant families ownership of their own land.

Second. To qualify for major American investment assistance, an underdeveloped nation should have put together a practical, comprehensive set of economic objectives and itemized the allocation of all available resources to achieve those objectives.

This assures that important tasks will be given priority, that the development program will be relevantly related to private and public income, and that the need for international help will be more accurately assessed.

If there is already a significant private business sector, it should be considered side by side in such a plan with Government-sponsored agricultural power and transportation projects in formulating the national development scheme.

Third. A qualifying country should have a reasonably substantial, competent, and graft-free civil service. Without able technicians, tax collectors, and administrators, large amounts of investment capital cannot be used to economic advantage.

Fourth. In order to qualify for long-term investment assistance, a country should also have a relatively stable government with popular roots.

Our democratic tradition makes most Americans unsympathetic to authoritarian governments of whatever persuasion. But this does not mean, Mr. Speaker, that our aid should be restricted to parliamentary democracies modeled on the West.

Indeed, we must face the fact that most of the new nations of Asia and Africa, over the long haul, may consider our own institutions unsuitable. Of these the least likely to succeed are those whose power is based on the shifting loyalties of feudal landlords and moneylenders.

By forgoing the support of both the middle-class center and the non-Communist left, such governments open the door wide for the Communists to pose as reformers and to press for united fronts. When we support such governments and they fall, our prestige and influence may tumble down with them.

Ataturk, who ruled Turkey for nearly a generation, was a dictator of the non-Communist left. We could not always endorse his methods. But since his government was rooted in popular support, he was able to put through vitally needed reforms, encourage the participation of his people, and lay the foundation for increasing democracy. Such a government deserves our help.

Fifth. Finally, in granting economic assistance, a country's political importance must be taken into account. This will be measured by its population, the size of its territory, its resources, its influence, and its location.

A WORD ABOUT INDIA

Although my purpose here today is to stress general principles and not their specific application, I may say parenthetically that the Republic of India, measured against the five standards I have listed, qualifies in special degree for sustained, expanded American economic aid.

With her 400 million people and her vast natural resources, India is not just "another underdeveloped country." It is a continent comparable in size and potential political influence to Europe.

The population of India nearly equals that of Africa and South America combined. In a single Indian State, Uttar Pradesh, there are more people than in Italy, France, or the United Kingdom.

Through its tough-minded tax system and equally tough controls on luxury imports, India has demonstrated its willingness to make major sacrifices in its own behalf.

India inherited an outstanding British-trained civil service, the most efficient in all Asia, and it has kept that service at a high degree of competence.

India has completed one 5-year plan and is now halfway through her second. A third, for which American, British, German, and Canadian assistance is sorely needed, is now in process of debate and discussion.

Finally, India stands today as the one political and economic alternative to China in Asia. If the Indian democratic experiment fails, whatever long-range hope may exist for freedom in the vast arc between Tokyo and Casablanca, falls with it.

On the basis of these practical considerations, I believe that India should be assured the intensive long-term investment and technical support needed to meet its economic development objectives.

Such countries as Pakistan, the Philippines, Formosa, Vietnam, Israel, Ghana, Tunisia, Chile, Costa Rica and several others could also meet the standards I have in mind.

As the capacity of still other countries approaches these criteria, and we see that more long-term aid there can be put to effective use, they should receive similar assistance from us.

MORE LIMITED HELP FOR OTHERS

Countries which are unable to meet meet minimum development standards should tactfully be told that they cannot expect investment assistance from us until they have created their own internal basis for successful growth.

Most emphatically, Mr. Speaker, this does not mean that we should turn our backs on them. On the contrary, there is much that we can and should continue to do to help.

We should offer to assist them in the creation of a comprehensive economic development plan which enables them to use their own resources to the best possible advantage.

We should help provide tax experts, engineering survey teams, and other technicians to create a workable administrative base.

We should encourage them to place import controls on luxury imports purchased for their wealthy upper class so that their scarce foreign exchange can be used for the essentials needed by the people.

We should urge them to inaugurate land reforms and suggest expert advisers to help them. In Japan and Formosa American Government experts took the lead in promoting a program of private land ownership that has helped the peasants in these two countries set records both for agricultural productivity and for the expansion of rural democracy.

More specifically and immediately we can help these nations to finance individual projects that are worthwhile in their own right, that are not dependent on the economy of the country as a whole, and that are clearly in the people's interest.

An example might be a modern hospital in the national capital with training facilities for doctors and nurses and an outpatient clinic system for the villages; or an expanded and improved university or agricultural experiment college.

SOME FLEXIBILITY NEEDED

I recognize the fact that some form of economic aid—officially called "defense support" or "special assistance"—is needed for straight political purposes, for compensatory economic reasons, to backstop miltiary aid, or as an expedient rental fee for the use of a military base.

But I submit, Mr. Speaker, that in recent years such aid has been unduly expanded.

Mutual security implies a partnership. It can and must be a two-way street. Yet over and over again we have been pressured into giving millions to governments to pay for the use of airbases designed to prevent their own destruction as well as ours.

American representatives abroad can and must make greater progress in placing our mutual security efforts in the military field on a true partnership basis.

LESSONS FROM IRAQ

My criticisms of the planning and administration of many of our foreign aid programs involve both military and economic assistance. Iraq provides a case in point. A brief review of developments there illustrates the need for a more realistic and less military-oriented approach.

On several occasions in 1953 and 1954 Nasser requested arms from the United States. This assistance was wisely refused, largely on the grounds that it would disrupt the balance of power with Israel, and thereby increase the danger of a clash between these neighboring nations.

However, in the spring of 1954, the administration agreed to send military aid to Iraq, which not only threatened the destruction of Israel, but which also was in direct conflict with Egypt for the leadership of the Arab bloc.

The Egyptians protested on the ground that this assistance represented a deliberate American effort to split the Arab world, and that it ignored Egypt's interests. These protests were disregarded.

In February 1955, the Baghdad Pact was set up to add the military "weight" of Iraq, Iran, and Pakistan to that of Turkey. Its stated purpose was to deter Soviet military aggression toward the Persian Gulf.

In the spring of that year the Congress was informed that the northern tier added greatly to the security of the region from communism invasion and that under our ally, Nuri es-Said, Iraq was the "keystone of the central arch."

However, Nuri himself declared repeatedly that the pact was directed primarily against Israel. Asked why the Western Powers were supplying Iraq with such vast quanties of arms if, as he claimed, Iraq had undertaken no obligations toward the West, Nuri reportedly threw up his hands and laughed: "Who knows? Maybe they're mad."

In Cairo, other Arab leaders did not fail to recognize that the Baghdad Pact called for much more substantial American arms shipments to Iraq. After his protests over these shipments had again been rejected, Nasser announced in November that Egypt had negotiated a military agreement with the Soviet Union.

These were not the only factors in this cause-and-effect relationship, to be sure. But these events were part of a chain of events that led to Nasser's seizure of the canal and ended with the British-French-Israel attack on Egypt.

ECONOMIC AID TO IRAQ

During this period, substantial American economic and technical assistance was also flowing to Iraq. Those responsible for administering this program reported to Congress that this help, together with the oil revenues available from the Iraqi Government, seemed to assure Iraq's economic success.

However, little effort was made to see that the people of Iraq benefited directly from our joint efforts. Thus the new irrigation programs, while vastly increasing the income of the landlords, brought only minor gains to the cultivators.

Iraq's gross national product rose rapidly. But because luxury imports were not curbed, because progressive tax programs were not introduced, and because land reforms were postponed, the increasing income served only to expand further the already explosive gap between rich and poor.

As I wrote in a book in 1957:

> Iraq is richly endowed with oil to provide foreign exchange, with the great Tigris and Euphrates Rivers to provide irrigation water, and with ample land. Able engineers and technicians, well supplied with capital, are now working vigorously to develop these resources.
>
> But engineering miracles will not in themselves create a happy orderly society. Most of the Iraqi land is in the hands of a relatively few politically powerful landlords.
> Unless there are sweeping changes in land ownership, plus rural extension programs to supply improved seeds, tools and credit, the newly created income will go largely to this fortunate minority, while the bitterness and frustration of the villages increase.

In the summer of 1958, the situation blew up and Colonel Kassim's government took power. Since then Communist influence has gained steadily and qualified observers now believe that Iraq is gradually moving into a situation where Soviet control will be inevitable.

Here, Mr. Speaker, we have an example of what happens to our interests when we overlook the political, economic and local realities in quest of a nebulous military security. In this case, as in others, we helped thereby to open the doors to the very forces which we have sought to contain.

In the streets of Baghdad, Communist-led mobs now shout insults at our representatives. American military equipment which we gave Iraq to oppose Communist aggression may ultimately be used by the Communists themselves against our friends the Israelis, our allies the Turks, or even ourselves.

I may add, Mr. Speaker, that there may be other equally calamitous case histories unless we soon bring our passion for military answers to complex political situations under better control.

NEED FOR TACT AND FLEXIBILITY

The Iraq example and others raise an obvious further question. What about the effect of the standards which I have proposed on the leaders of unprepared nations whose good will is essential to us?

Will the system which I have proposed be construed and resented as political interference by nations which fail to qualify?

If we were to use our aid to pressure such nations into following our lead in the cold war, resentment would be inevitable. But is it unreasonable for the American people, who themselves pay such heavy taxes, to ask that their assistance be efficiently and honestly used?

My experience in Asia and Africa leads me to believe that the principles which I have proposed will be readily accepted, provided they are presented by tactful American negotiators, supported by a firm congressional mandate.

Indeed, I am confident that most governments can be persuaded that these criteria are essential in their own long-range interests. Many of them will welcome such standards as a lever with which to persuade reactionary elements within their own countries to cease blocking constructive reforms.

Therefore I propose that the mutual security bill should clearly outline the basis on which we intend our technical assistance and development loans to be distributed.

ONE BILLION FOR DLF

My final proposal, Mr. Speaker, involves the allocation of funds within the mutual security budget.

Although military assistance to nations which have genuine need for it must be maintained and even increased, the standards which I have suggested should result in military aid reductions in other areas.

My proposed standards for the distribution of economic aid will result in additional savings. In anticipation of such savings, and even without them, I strongly urge that the authorization for the Development Loan Fund be increased from the $700 million requested to $1 billion for fiscal year 1960.

The Development Loan Fund may well become the most creative and effective foreign policy instrument that we have organized in recent years. It is soundly conceived and is being administered with increasing competence and sensitivity.

The $700 million requested this year for the Development Loan Fund is clearly inadequate in terms of our national objectives. This figure could easily be raised to $1 billion within the present budgetary confines of the $3.9 billion mutual security request.

In my earlier remarks I have suggested how the $300 million difference could be saved from other aspects of this program. But whether this extra $300 million is derived inside or outside the program, it is clear that we can both afford it and ought to provide it.

NOT A PARTISAN QUESTION

Mr. Speaker, in offering these criticisms and observations, I would like to emphasize that I do not imply that our difficulties started with the election of 1952. On the contrary, many of the mistakes to which I refer were begun under the previous administration of which I was a part.

There are champions of foreign aid in the administration and in the Republican Party in Congress who are as anxious as any of us to place this essential program on a more solid foundation. Some of its influential and effective opponents, moreover, are to be found among my Democratic colleagues.

But regardless of party affiliations, I believe that the time has come for friends of this program to say bluntly in public what they have been saying in private, and to call on the Congress and the administration to make the beginnings at least of a fresh start.

If the new direction and emphasis which I have proposed is accepted by the Congress, we will demonstrate to the world that our mutual security program is more than a temporary cold war gambit, and that we have embarked on a determined, long-range program designed to give men everywhere the opportunity to live under governments of their own choosing in a world of increasing prosperity and peace.

It will curb wasteful and politically disrupting shipments of American military equipment to countries which are not under direct threat from Communist aggression.

It will help establish priorities in our economic aid allocations so that those governments and people best able to use our assistance in a fruitful and beneficial way will receive the first consideration.

It will put other governments on notice that major additional help from the United States awaits their own willingness to sacrifice as others are sacrificing in terms of internal taxes, luxury import controls, land reforms, careful economic planning and personnel training.

It will also indicate that vital though we know the foreign aid program to be, the Congress does not regard it as a cure-all ointment to be applied indiscriminately to all international pains and bruises, no matter what kind or how severe.

Most important of all, Mr. Speaker, it will indicate the Congress of the United States is in a mood for changes in the basic legislation, that we are convinced that an intelligent overhaul of this program is long overdue, and that at the next session we will welcome a redirection of the present program by those responsible for its administration.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOWLES. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. UDALL. I would like to commend our colleague from Connecticut for what I consider a most distinguished speech. In fact, I have not listened to a speech in this field which represented the scholarship and penetrating insight and first-hand consideration that the gentleman has brought here today. I commend him for giving his colleagues the benefit of his great wisdom.

Mr. BOWLES. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. UDALL. To be more specific, when the gentleman was discussing India, having served as Ambassador there, I wonder if he would care to elaborate on what he feels an adequate program would be today for India, with particular reference perhaps to the proposals which have been initiated in the other body by the Senators from Kentucky and Massachusetts.

Mr. BOWLES. In April 1961 India will complete its second 5-year plan of economic development. They are now begining to put together their third 5-year plan.

This is likely to be a very ambitious plan. It will include more river valley developments, irrigation, building of roads, stimulating new industries, and the extension of their rural community development program, which already includes 320,000 Indian villages out of a total of nearly 600,000, some 190 million people.

I may add parenthetically that the basis and many of the techniques of that particular program were borrowed from our own rural extension programs here in America.

Under this plan many thousands of dedicated, competent, well trained young men work in the villages to introduce better seeds, better methods of planting and plowing, new means of keeping their water pure and clean, and, above all, of stimulating the villages to build their own schools, their own roads.

The Indian Government's extension workers do not say: "We will build you a new school or a road." They say, "Your rice will soon be harvested. How many of you will be willing then to give part of your extra time to building a new school for your children, or a road so that when a child is sick a doctor may be brought in?"

This program does not come from the top down. It is a grass roots effort out of the villages where 80 percent of the people live. If we calculate the direct contribution of the villagers on the basis of only 20 cents for a day's work, it totals in a year more than $300 million. They actually put in more each year than the Government itself does.

In the third 5-year plan the Indian Government wants to expand this effort until it stretches clear across India.

The other objectives of the Indian third 5-year plan are not yet established. When they are established many Americans will say that they are too ambitious, that India is biting off more than it can chew.

However, we should remember that these goals will be dictated, not by us, nor even by the Indians, but by the extraordinary economic drive that is under way in Communist China. If India is to remain free it must meet this challenge.

I do not mean to say that India must match China in statistical accomplishment. Doubtless, totalitarian China will be able to do certain things that democratic India cannot do.

But India must at least be able to point to comparable progress. She must be able at the very least to say: "China may have more steel mills. But in India we have good new mills, too, and we are making considerable economic progress. Most important, we are accomplishing these things in a free society under a democratic constitution, and with due regard for human dignity. In India, unlike China, we have progress and freedom, too."

Thus in a sense it will be the dynamic pace of the Chinese Communist development that sets the goals of India's 5-year plan. And we should never forget that if India loses in its competitive effort free Asia will be disheartened and the whole world will lose.

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOWLES. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. EVINS. I think we are all seriously concerned with doing the right thing about this program. I have listened to the gentleman with a greal deal of interest, and I am sure we all welcome constructive suggestions as to how the program could be improved.

When the development loan matter came before the appropriations committee, as the gentleman knows, the subcommittee only approved $100 million of the $250 million requested, because beginning on July 1 they were going to ask for $700 million more. When the full committee heard all of the debate on both sides, the majority of the full committee was convinced that the $100 million which the subcommittee had approved was not needed at this time.

I may say that, in my judgment, one of the reasons why this program has been delayed or slowed was not because we did not want to do the right thing but because a lot of the Members gained the impression that this involved a lot of soft loans, that they had written to all the countries over the world requesting them: Send us your letters, send us your requests as to what you need.

When those letters came in it was stated that the total of these amounts would be required immediately. Beside the Development Loan Fund, the gentleman, of course, is aware of the fact that since World War II when all of these programs I am speaking about began, $82 billion has been expended and authorized through the various loan and grant programs to foreign nations and, as the gentleman I am sure knows, there are some seven agencies of Government making grants and loans in various fields of foreign aid. There is the Export-Import Bank, there is the International Monetary Fund, there is the International Cooperation Administration, there is the mutual security program among others. The Development Loan Fund is another. I do not recall all seven of them at the moment. But, these are some of the agencies of Government that are making grants and loans in the foreign aid program.

I want to say for the RECORD that I represent the Cordell Hull district of Tennessee in Congress, and I do not consider myself an isolationist. I was here when the program was started, but when it was started it was said to be a temporary program. Now, some 12 years later, the President has recommended a 10-year permanent program. I think it is time that there be a real analysis of the program, to determine where we are going. There is need for a genuine reappraisal of the entire foreign aid program, and I trust the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BOWLES] and the members of his committee will address themselves to this task. I believe in some areas the programs are necessary and essential, but how much and to what extent is another question. I commend the gentleman for addressing himself to the need for reforms and improvements, in these aid programs. His experience in this field gives him special qualifications to point out needed improvements. Personally I have supported aspects of the program in the past. I have taken the position that since we need an insurance program the payments should be reduced as much as possible. Will the gentleman express himself—and I am sure he is capable—as to some of the areas in which improvements in this program can be made?

Mr. BOWLES. I think the gentleman and I would be able to agree on some points at least. First of all, the question of consolidation of some of our aid efforts; I hope that in the next year we may begin to bring some of these programs into closer coordination.

Several different proposals have already been made, and I think more should be encouraged. I would like to see a committee set up inside or outside Congress to consider what as a practical matter we can do to eliminate some of the overlapping responsibilities and report to the next Congress. I think this would be most helpful.

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, I would think that it would be opportune to make that study now. Why postpone it for another year and put it off for another year? When we have need for development of projects in our own country, they are subject to rigid cost-benefit formulas. We are advised by the Budget Bureau and the administration "they must be deferred, they must be postponed, they are not essential at all," but programs overseas, are immediately approved and they are not required to come up to any cost-benefit formula. If the Congress cuts the foreign aid program just the least bit, we are attacked as being irresponsible in our actions, and if we spend on programs which are desirable for our own country we are attacked as spenders.

So, Mr. Speaker, I think that it is time that the Congress exercise its own judgments in these matters. Again, I should like to commend the gentleman from Connecticut for the fine contribution he is making in this important field.

Mr. BOWLES. I strongly agree. I would like to say that I have been talking about these needs for a long time. But I was elected to Congress only last November and this is the first opportunity I have had to speak here about it.

Mr. EVINS. I would like to say that I think the gentleman is making a distinct and very meritorious contribution, and I commend him for his fine efforts.

Mr. BOWLES. I thank the gentleman. I have been pressing for administrative consolidation and for cutting out waste in this urgently necessary effort for a very long time.

But I do not think that the Development Loan Fund as it now stands is sufficient for its task; I believe it needs a really adequate budget and it will need it for many years to come. We have been told by some members of both Democratic and Republican administrations that this program will be needed only for a year or 2 or 3, and this has caused both confusion and frustration here in Congress and indeed throughout the world.

This effort is a long-term proposition. The new nations of Asia and Africa and the older nations of Latin America are waking up to the possibilities of a better life. Yet they do not have the capital or the technicians to do what they must do.

Modern communications spreads the news to the most remote villages of all the remarkable new things that man can accomplish—greater rice output, the miracles of medicine, of education, of industry.

The Soviet Union says to the people of these underdeveloped continents: "Only 2 generations ago we, too, were sunk in poverty. But look at us now. Through Communist techniques we have quickly become the world's second most powerful industrial nation. We have the capital and the technicians to make your efforts easier. We want to help."

This is the Kremlin's siren song, and it is effective.

Let us consider for a moment the British in the days of their greatness when their Pax Britannica brought reasonable peace to the world—although not necessarily freedom.

In those days the British exported every year nearly 10 percent of their gross national product. That is a vast amount of money. If we exported capital on that basis today, it would mean $40 to $50 billion of private and Government capital going abroad each year.

But economically and politically we now live in a different world. The British had no income tax, no corporation tax. Therefore, private savings could easily carry almost the entire load of capital investment abroad.

The British also faced a relatively secure world. The British Navy, the British Army and colonial controls saw to that.

May I remind the House that foreign equipment and military technicians such as Lafayette and Von Steuben helped bring us victory in our Revolutionary War, that British and Continental European capital amounting to billions of dollars helped in the 19th century to build our railroads and our industry; and that foreign technicians such as Einstein, Fermi, and Bohr recently helped us to harness the atom.

We are now moving into a period which is infinitely more explosive and more demanding. Private American capital can play a major role abroad, and I think we should encourage our industrial leaders to do more. But there are strict limits due to the pressure of our modern tax system on the one hand, and the relatively unstable political conditions which investors now face abroad, on the other. So not unnaturally many American industrialists are reluctant to invest their money with the old assurances of the British.

Therefore, our American Government must carry a heavy load of responsibility for action.

We have this program on the books today. It is my guess that we are going to be voting for it or voting against it 10 years from today.

This is going to be a long-range effort whether we like it that way or not. We are living in a world that is not suddenly going to become orderly and self-sufficient.

Yet there is every reason for us to have confidence in what we can do. We have all seen the miracles that were accomplished, in Europe through the Marshall plan. Who would have dreamed of the remarkable developments that were made possible by our vision and capital in Europe?

Averell Harriman, who had much to do with the Marshall plan and who is just back from India, told me recently that he thought within 6 or 7 or 8 years India could generate enough of her own capital to supply the essential bloodstream of new investment from savings within India. That sounds optimistic, but I believe he may be right.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOWLES. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. The gentleman may be interested to know that about 10 years ago, I was on a program at the University of Colorado campus in Boulder, where we were discussing the new Marshall plan and point 4 programs which were just going into effect. The discussion was around the question of how rapidly could this job be done. A gentleman who had already had some work overseas having to do with technical assistance and economic development took the floor at the end of the discussion and said that he was pleased to see the enthusiasm that was present there. But he thought that we should disabuse ourselves of the notion that this could be done in any 4-year period. He said that he hoped he would find as much enthusiasm at the end of 15 years after that time, because he said by that time we would just about be started on the task, it was that monumental. I think the American people need to understand the task in those terms.

I think the gentleman has made a fine contribution and I thank him for it. I invite his attention and the attention of the House to the resolution calling for international education cooperation, which I expect to present this afternoon.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOWLES. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the gentleman from Connecticut for his statement, for the insight, the balance, and the sound judgment that he has exhibited. Particularly I want to express appreciation that he has emphasized one of the things that I have tried to stress all these years and which needs reemphasis, with new voices, namely: We in the West have tended, in my opinion, to concentrate too much in this program on the material side of it; the calories, the guns, the power-plants, the dollars, and so forth. We have given too little attention to the fact that these folks are also human beings, with some desires that material things will not satisfy.

We have done a wonderful job with the tangibles; we have not been sufficiently sensitive to the intangibles. The gentleman has pointed that out.

Some of these peoples have worked for decades and even for centuries to get their national independence, freedom from foreign control. Just the feeling that this is at last their own country, is very precious to them. Sometimes in our very zeal to help them—what I call the imperialism of efficiency—we crowd them too much. We push them along faster than they want to or can go; we make them wonder whether after all they are masters in their own house. And a resentment sometimes develops that defeats our common purpose. It may seem to us like lack of appreciation on their part, but that is not the true explanation.

We see the people want to be free, to be apart; and we are doing our best to help them become free. But that is only half of what they want. The minute they are free, they want to be together, to belong, to be important, to be needed, to be appreciated, to be able to contribute more themselves. They want to have a sense that they are doing something important for us as well as we for them. Too often we give the impression of working for them at their problems, instead of with them at problems of concern to us all.

Sometimes we give the impression that we think we know better than they do what is best for them in their own country. Even if, because of our wider experience, we sometimes do know better how to meet a given problem, we sometimes do it in a highhanded way, without intending to do so, that alienates them. It is no use making them fatter, stronger, or richer if we alienate them in the process.

The gentleman has emphasized that point so well today, because of his recognition that in the end it is what people think, not how much they have to eat, that determines where they will be in this world struggle.

We cannot overemphasize the importance of getting away from our usual emphasis on the quantity of our aid. People ask, "How much money shall we have in the mutual security program this year?" The more important thing is not how much is given, but how it is given; not the amount but the manner of the aid.

The world struggle is like a great election campaign. The peoples of the world are choosing sides. For which side, the free world or the Communist world, are they going to vote? In some election campaigns you may be able to win some votes here or there by passing out gifts; but in the end you get elected or defeated by what the people think of you. That depends on whether what you present appeals to them as a program that offers dignity and hope and mutual respect, for the future, not just material benefits.

If the gentleman will permit me to add an additional comment, the greatest paradox of the 20th century to me is this, that we in the West whose magnificent material achievements are the result, we believe, of certain basic spiritual values—and I mean spiritual in the broad sense of things of the spirit—have nevertheless managed to get ourselves before much of the world as if we cared only or largely about material things—food, guns, and dollars. In contrast, the Communists, who deny even the existence of spiritual values, have nevertheless skillfully managed in many parts of the world to get themselves before the people there as if they are the ones who care most about the thing of the spirit, the dignity, the equality of status, the comradeship, the relaxation of tensions, the sense of belonging, that human beings hunger for everywhere.

We have so much better a cause than the Communists but we have not done anything like as good a job of presenting it as the cause deserves.

We generally go into a country, look around and ask, How much do they need? The answer to that is astronomical.

A second question is more important, and the gentleman has mentioned it, How much can they effectively use?

A third question is even more important: How much can they self-respectingly receive, and in what manner can we best give it?

If we would always study the second and third of those questions, not just how much do they need, we would have a better program. I think it could be somewhat smaller than it is but size is not the chief essential. We have got ourselves into a position where if we try to change the program, in these directions, the bureaucracy already set up resists—as happens in all Government agencies. It is easier to go along in the established pattern. Because one country needs a certain emphasis or kind of program, the agencies tend to give that kind of program to all other countries. The gentleman has seen countries, and so have I, where we had a hundred projects in operation, different kinds of projects. They were needed in some big country. But in some little country with different problems, perhaps only 5 main projects or 10, were essential to its future; yet because a pattern has been developed for the big ones, the form or routine is followed everyhere else. We give them all the full treatment.

I am glad to welcome the gentleman from Connecticut on our committee to help it redefine in ways that are fresh and appealing the basic objectives the Congress had had all along.

The gentleman and I will probably not agree on all the details, of course, but the kind of statement he has made is the sort that we need to have made more often and by persons who are responsible, if we are to have a program that is alive, flexible, imaginative, and adjusted to the needs of individual countries.

Congress also has to do some reevaluating of its own role in formulating and supporting the program as well as the executive agencies that carry it on. What we face is obviously a long-range problem. How in the world do you handle a long-range problem with a short-range program? Can it be expected to succeed too well when Congress appropriates a year at a time? I often think of it this way: When Pearl Harbor came, did we declare war for just 1 year, and at the end of that year, debate for 2 months or so whether we were going to fight a second year? No; we just declared war. Everybody knew that we were going to stay in that war until we won it. We did not freeze the conduct of the war. We could adjust or modify it as circumstances indicated. But we committed ourselves to carry on to victory, however long it might take. Now, we have never done that with this program. We just say, "We will go ahead for another year and then we will decide about the following year." It never gets a chance to get its roots down firmly. We pull them up to see how they are doing. How can our partners go all out when they do not know what to count on from us?

My friend, the gentleman from Tennessee, has objected that mutual security was intended to be a temporary program. Well, I remember that the farm price-support program began as a temporary short-range program, too; but we have it now nearly 20 years later.

The program for our own American Indians began about 175 years ago, I guess; but we all know we are going to continue to have it until we get the problem solved.

We must carry on this program not because we like it, but because of the nature of the task ahead of us. There is a world in turmoil and it needs more than anything else the kind of strength and leadership this country and its people are in a better position to give than any other country or people. We have to stay with it, modifying it as we go along and adjusting it to changing situations, until the threat is removed. We have to do that not primarily for the sake of other peoples but in order to have a world in which we ourselves can live in decency and security.

Mr. BOWLES. I thank the gentleman. And I would like to say this. If both political parties here in Congress, and also the administration would take the position that the gentleman from Minnesota has suggested we take, with our emphasis squarely on relating the traditional purposes of American democracy to today's world, I would feel infinitely more confident of the future.

Our relationship with other human beings must be on the basis of mutual respect for their cultures, their judgments, and their opinions. If only we could be guided by such basic human considerations in our world affairs we Americans would gain a power thereby that would be greater in some ways even than our missiles and bombs.

If we cannot soon come to terms with the human race, if we cannot build solid bridges of human understanding with other peoples—at least those outside the Communist world—we will become constantly more isolated as a rich, resented minority in a world that is struggling for survival.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BOWLES. I am glad to yield to my colleague.

Mr. JUDD. I think sometimes the key word to describe the attitude that we are trying to achieve abroad is confidence. To come back to the election simile—people vote for the man in whom they have confidence. The people in the world will vote for us if they have confidence in us. They will vote for others if they do not have confidence in us. It is not primarily confidence in our power; they all know our power. But confidence in our character, confidence that we will use our power with wisdom and sensitiveness and steadfastness.

There are five "p's," it seems to me, that ought to be the basis of our policy. The first is power—moral, military, and economic power. But power in support of what? Power in support of principles—our historic principles to which the gentleman referred earlier. Both Mr. Nasser and Mr. Sukarno told our subcommittee when we visited their countries several years ago, "Why, we are only trying to do in our country precisely what you did when you were under a colonial power. You fought a war against it to gain your freedom. The inspiration for our revolution comes out of your own revolutionary history." That is unquestionably the truth.

So the first two "p's" are power in support of our historic principles. Then power in support of pledges—our honorable commitments—and in support of peoples, free peoples. And then we need a fifth "p," that is patience. It takes time and patience to work it all out. If we will keep these five "p's" constantly before us, I am sure such a program gives greater hope of success in getting through the nightmare of tension, frustration, fear and uncertainty in which we are now living than any other kind of program can offer.

Mr. BOWLES. You are entirely right. If one thinks of power only in terms of military power, how do we explain Gandhi?

Gandhi succeeded in pushing the British out of India. Yet did not have a single flattop aircraft carrier; he commanded no atomic artillery or armored divisions; he had no navy and no tanks. But Gandhi had powerful ideas, so that when the British gave India independence they gave it in an atmosphere of good will and mutual respect which Gandhi largely made possible.

I do not suggest that Gandhi's way could have succeeded against the Nazis or the Communists. They would have crushed him like an ant. But nevertheless it was an exciting testimony to the power of faith and dignity in a world that has come to devalue such influences on human behavior.

Mr. WIER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOWLES. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. WIER. I think I ought to make known that on Saturday evening last I had the happy and pleasant experience of being in an audience which the gentleman addressed in the city of Minneapolis, numbering about 1,500, where I heard much of what you have said here today. Your message to the people of Minneapolis and throughout the State was well received, as I am sure you realize.

I had the same experience as my colleague from Tennessee had. When I came here in 1948 I came here very much in support of the then Marshall plan. I think one of the greatest administrators of this plan that we had during the life of foreign aid was one that was most unfortunately lost in an airplane accident in Iran. I refer to Dr. Henry Bennett of Oklahoma.

He was a master in this field of endeavor on the needs of the countries in the development of the program. For 6 years I supported this program in its entirety. I subscribed to it. During the last few years I have lost some of my former confidence, because of the mistakes and other misgivings in addition to the waste in the military program and the technical help offer of this country. It has rather discouraged me so that you will probably find me voting for amendments to the foreign aid program, as I did last year. But in the final result I will vote for the program.

I do not think this program has any place for military aid. That should go through the Military and Defense Department appropriation bill. Where we have provided military help for what we thought was our friends, in foreign countries, in which those very arms and military hardware were the base upon which a new dictatorship and overthrow of the friendly government happened. The latest was Iraq. Before that Pakistan, Egypt, and Burma, and other countries. We have had the experience of finding military arms that we thought would help and preserve and develop our so-called friends there, used to overthrow the government we thought was our friend.

I have a very diversified district in the State of Minnesota. Congressman JUDD and I split Minneapolis. I have one side of the river and he has the other. In Minneapolis my support of foreign aid is well received, but when I get out into my rural counties then I find considerable opposition to my support of foreign aid. There are reasons for that—a number of them.

I want to say that insofar as the State of Minnesota is concerned, our university has made a great study of whether Minnesota benefits by this program or whether it is a costly program for the taxpayers. The University of Minnesota a couple of years ago developed a statewide survey to determine, if possible, whether or not the State of Minnesota benefited or was hurt by both foreign aid and foreign trade and I may say the findings were favorable. However, I do, today find I have division in my district; the urban friendly, and the rural unfriendly. As a matter of fact, they refer to it as a rathole. So I do hope that the gentleman from Connecticut, along with other members of the Foreign Affairs Committee can come up with some revision of the loose operation and what I term very much waste.

I want to congratulate the gentleman for what he said in the city of Minneapolis on Saturday night. I think he delivered a fine message and an able message.

Mr. BOWLES. I thank the gentleman. I might add one thing. Over a period of the next 10 years I think the American farmer will become one of our greatest internationalists. There is no way that America can solve its agricultural marketing except in terms of world markets. I believe that many of your friends in Minnesota will be applauding you in the coming years for continuing to give your support to the foreign aid program.

Mr. WIER. We will have to get a new Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOWLES. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. GEORGE. I want to congratulate the gentleman upon the address he has made. I am inclined to agree with the gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Minnesota that it is high time something was done with our foreign aid. In fact, I think it detected a little contradiction in your own address. If I am not mistaken, the gentleman began by stating he was going to support the program in its entire amount. I do not want to be alined as an opponent to the mutual security program at all, but, if I am not mistaken, the gentleman also said that there is enough extravagance and waste to be cut out of our foreign aid program to give more and more millions to the development loan program. If that is true, why would it not be possible to cut the amount of foreign aid in the other branches?

Mr. BOWLES. In my opinion the Development Loan Fund is inadequate for its task; indeed it is nowhere near adequate.

This is a truly constructive program. Indeed it is the one area of effort where we still have the initiative in our dealings with the world and we must see that we keep and extend that initiative.

I believe that the standards which I have suggested for the allocation of military and economic assistance can enable us to save as much as $300 million. If we add this sum to the Development Loan Fund I am confident that it will be spent with much greater effect

We cannot be precise, Congress cannot administer such a program. We can only except the administrators and the Executive to live up to the policy terms we lay down.

The development loan program should be extended and expanded. I would like, as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JUDD] suggested, to see it authorized over several years so that better planning may become possible.

How could General Motors, for instance, plan its next year's operation with no idea of how much capital it is going to have? Any long-range development program requires some knowledge of what resources will be available.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOWLES. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from New York.

Mr. CELLER. I was not present during all of the gentleman's address. I am sure I missed a great deal by not being here.

I would like to get the gentleman's point of view similar to the one expressed by him with me over a telecast last week concerning aid to India. The gentleman has served with great distinction as out Ambassador to India and Nepal. I think it would be well for him to dwell for a few moments on the need for aid to the great subcontinent of India. I would like to get the gentleman's views on that matter too.

Mr. BOWLES. The gentleman will find in the RECORD that I have already commented rather fully on India and its 5-year plan and I have suggested things that I believe should be done.

I might add briefly that in my opinion India is the key to a free and independent Asia. If India fails to reach her democratic objectives there will be little hope that other nations less well endowed with resources and leadership will succeed.

We must see that India has the resources with which to succeed and thereby to prove to the people of Asia and Africa that freedom and democracy are practical effective means of getting things done.

Mr. NELSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOWLES. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSEN. First, I wish to thank the gentleman for the very fine remarks he has made relative to this program. I would like to call attention to a poll that we took in my district, which is predominantly rural. We sent out 38,000 letters with questions relative to this program and we find a large percentage, better than 50 percent—I think around 60 percent—of the farm people favor the program along the lines that the gentleman has suggested. They look with great favor and hope to the possibility of the disposal of our surplus farm products worldwide.

I thank the gentleman for the manner in which he has made his presentation. It certainly demonstrates a uniformity of thinking and the kind of thinking we are going to need if we are going to effect a climate worldwide that will bring about world peace.

Mr. BOWLES. I thank the gentleman. I may add that I wrote Dr. Gallup recently, and asked him if he had made any polls as to where this program stood with the American people. He sent me one made a year ago that indicated, as I remember it, that 69 percent favored the full amount, without any cuts at all.

Yet, over and over again, we hear it stated right here in this body that the American people are against this effort to build a more secure and productive world. The people who are against it may write most of the letters. But I know that tens of millions of thoughtful people who apparently do not write enough letters, are heart and soul for it.

And, if only we would place this program within the familiar framework of traditional American democratic purposes and intent we will enable the American people to understand it much better and its support will grow and they will be proud of it.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOWLES. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. MEYER. I would like to compliment the gentleman particularly for his very skillful and diplomatic presentation of a rather touchy subject. He has used the surgeon's scalpel when most of us would maybe use the meat ax. I think he has performed a particularly valuable service in indicating that the American way is not necessarily just the way that shows fear of communism or a policy of negativism and containment, but he has indicated, I believe, quite clearly that there is a positive approach; that we should reexamine our foreign policy and our mutual security program, taking out things in it that are either wasteful or improperly in it; reexamine the values of technical assistance and economic aid that will help the people of other nations help themselves and so join with us in a common effort. I believe that he has clearly indicated that in this field we require political leadership; not military leadership alone, but we need political leadership in which the opinions of the military leadership are considered and all other opinions are considered in stating our foreign policy, in determining what we will do with our mutual security program. And, I believe that he has also performed another valuable service in indicating that the Members of Congress and the American people can be perfectly loyal in having what might even be a loyal opposition approach; that this is perfectly possible and perfectly good and perfectly wise. I think most of all that we need to find a different way than we have been following in the past if we are going to solve this problem of peace or war and to prevent the horrors of a nuclear war; to develop the efforts of the United Nations; to work out some system of international law and order. And, I want to compliment my colleague from Connecticut for the very excellent presentation he has made and for calling our attention to a problem that must be solved.

Mr. BOWLES. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, I want to say that I do agree with you on your thought that the emphasis should be placed on long-term loans and technical assistance. I am wondering whether you believe that what we have done in the way of foreign aid across the board has been publicized sufficiently in foreign countries.

Mr. BOWLES. I really feel that in almost all countries the extent of our help is pretty well understood.

But, let me go back, if I may, to the very point that I have been trying to make throughout this statement. People who seek thanks and gratitude for their good deeds rarely succeed in getting it. If we constantly wonder whether we have been thanked enough, we will not be thanked as much as people in their hearts are inclined to thank us. That is human nature.

In India—and I know this is true in other countries—the more modest we are, the more we understate our contribution and build up their own, the more appreciation they will feel and express.

Many times I was publicly, and privately thanked in India for what America has done. And I always replied and I meant it deeply: "If you succeed in demonstrating that democracy really works in India, if you can prove to the new nations of the world that these same ideals of freedom are workable in your country, it is we who will be grateful to you, because you will have given new meaning and conviction to the great truths on which my country has been based. So, please do not thank us. Our gratitude should go to you."

If we approach our relations with the recipient countries on the basis of such mutual respect we will make far more friends than if we wave the American flag every time we hand somebody a dish of rice or a new plow.

In the past we have boasted too much, and so we have sometimes lost the respect and understanding we have wanted to win.

Mr. GIAIMO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOWLES. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. GIAIMO. I should like to commend and thank my good friend and fellow resident from Connecticut for his usually fine understanding of these problems which confront us in the world and for his dedicated attempts to offer solutions and suggestions as to some of these problems involved. Concerning this question of gratitude from other peoples and countries where we lend or grant these many billions of dollars under this foreign aid program, I wonder if part of the reason for the fact that there is a lack of gratitude or even an indication in many areas of anti-Americanism, when we are trying to develop friendships, is the failure on our part to accomplish one of the objectives which the gentleman mentioned earlier, that is, to understand different cultures and different traditions of peoples and countries. I believe that this is particularly true in many instances on the part of American tourists to other countries and on the part of many American representatives and officials who visit these countries.

Would the gentleman care to comment on the lack of understanding of the cultures and traditions which differ from ours?

Mr. BOWLES. Mr. Speaker, I think my friend from Connecticut has brought up a very fundamental point.

In many parts of the world we are in trouble today, not because we have failed to do enough, but rather because we have done it in the wrong way. For instance, I wonder if what Latin America wants more from us than anything else is not mutual respect, a greater sense of partnership; a feeling that we truly respect them, for their culture and their great accomplishments?

Of course, this largely gets back to the people we send overseas. We must find more Americans ready to serve our country abroad who feel these things deeply, who can express them and live them. And I might add that their wives should understand them, too, because one who does understand these American principles and objectives can be of enormous assistance; and vice versa.

I believe that we must be much more careful in the selection of many of our people for service abroad and in their training of them and orientation. We must also encourage them to go out to the villages where most of the people live, and to understand the problems there, and to spend less time in the nations' capitals.

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOWLES. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CARNAHAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the gentleman for the statement he has made and for the excellent replies he has made to the questions that have been put to him. I feel that his explanation should help the membership as well as the people in the country better to understand the foreign aid and mutual security program.

Mr. BOWLES. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. DADDARIO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOWLES. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. DADDARIO. We in Connecticut for a long time have followed very carefully and conscientiously the career of the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BOWLES]. He has demonstrated today a penetrating knowledge of his subject.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Connecticut has suggested a program with five standards. One of them is a willingness on the part of a country to make sacrifices on its own behalf. He has suggested a most important feature of our mutual security program should be to take into consideration the kind of assistance and the way we give it.

If we apply that to the mutual security program, and I believe we should, how does it fit this situation? I understand the intention this year is to withdraw from Israel the direct aid provisions of the program and to confine its assistance to the Development Loan Fund which the gentleman has mentioned today, and which is very much restricted in amount. May I ask the gentleman if he does not think that Israel should be included in the direct grants program? Does he not feel that a program which has achieved a marked degree of success should be continued to the point of certainty? In an area as volatile as that in which Israel finds itself, should we not be certain that we have reached a successful conclusion before withdrawing from the challenge which faces us?

Mr. BOWLES. I am grateful to my friend from Hartford and I agree with him. The apparent cutback in aid to Israel under the mutual security program is disturbing to many of us.

I know of no nation that more clearly fits the standards which I have proposed for the allocation of economic assistance. Israel is a symbol of what a free people can achieve.

I am confident that this question will be fully explored in the Foreign Affairs Committee and consideration given to special language in the committee report designed to correct this situation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HARDY). The time of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BOWLES] has expired.

EXTENDING THE VOTE TO CHILDREN BETWEEN 12 AND 21

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the request just received from a group of my younger constituents, I am bringing up the subject of extending the vote to children between the ages of 12 and 21. It is unusual when youngsters of doll-playing and kite-flying age take time out from their busy day to show an interest in the affairs of their Government. While we do not expect an immediate and overwhelming acceptance of the proposal they are advocating, I think it only fair to let my colleagues and the people of our country know of their interest. Under unanimous consent, I ask that their letter be included as a portion of my remarks in the body of the RECORD.

SAN DIEGO, CALIF., November 11, 1958.

DEAR CONGRESS: We think that the children between 12 and 21 should be able to vote, also.

It would give more of an opportunity to give their opinion. We are of age 9–11 and can see the difficulties, but we can also see the advantages.

At the next Congress meeting we would appreciate it if you would bring it up.

Thank you.

THE FARM SITUATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COAD] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. COAD. Mr. Speaker, there is no domestic problem as great or as complex as the farm problem. As a representative of one of the Nation's finest agricultural districts and as a member of the House Committee on Agriculture, the farm problem is uppermost in my mind. However, a person does not need to be on the Agriculture Committee or even from a farm district to realize the devastating effect which the present agricultural crisis is having on our economy. All one has to do is get the record out and study it over even in a casual manner to discover that many of the economic ills affecting our entire Nation's economy can be traced back to the farm situation. We have millions of unemployed today, the most of which could be put to work producing the things which farmers want and which farmers need to buy if the farmers had the money with which to buy them. Not only would the farmers be buying if they had the money, but they would start a chain reaction and the entire economy would be benefited.

The overlying problem facing agriculture is lack of price for the commodities produced, overproduction of commodities already in surplus, a great expense to the taxpayer for storage costs, and in general a demoralized condition which has been enhanced and even instigated by bumbling adminstration practices which appear to have only the end result of completely destroying the farm program.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the farmer must have a program to assist him to organize to compete to obtain a price, and effect production limitations. We are all idealists to the extent that we should like to see the farmer able to operate strictly on the law of supply and demand. But we are also realists to the extent that we know that with so many millions of farmers they are unable to organize to effectively stabilize either price or the amount of production.

A quick rundown of some of the important statistics regarding the farm situation point most graphically what I am saying.

First. On an average our farmers are receiving only about 80 percent of a fair price for their commodities.

Second. There is about a $9 billion surplus of farm commodities.

Third. The Department of Agriculture is already predicting that about all of those commodities in surplus will be increased this crop year.

It has been estimated that the average yearly loss of income for our farmers from 1951 through 1957 in the State of Iowa alone has been over $1 billion. This is an alarming fact, Mr. Speaker. According to these figures, during the past 7 years we would have had over $7 billion in Iowa which now is forever lost. Other States in the Midwest have suffered proportionately.

It seems that the American farmer has been singled out for special "surplus price depressing" treatment. According to Assistant Secretary of Defense Perkins McGuire, who appeared before the House Appropriations Committee, the armed services have $60 billion worth of surplus equipment that is in warehouses right now. For the most part these are usable items and they are increasing this stockpile at the rate of $9 billion a year. There are other stockpiles but we have had the wisdom in industrial circles to keep these stockpiles off the market—and we do not even talk about them being a threat to the market; therefore they don't affect the price. But it seems there are spokesmen who, in fact, should be talking in favor of the welfare of the farmers of our Nation but who continually inflict the fact of commodity surpluses upon the minds of the people so that surpluses have become the greatest bogey to farm prices of all time.

There are also official spokesmen who continually tell our farm people to give up and get off the farm. Let it become big business. Let it become a harsh, cruel commercial enterprise and forget the type of living one finds on the farms.

There are those who have espoused a philosophy, and I regret that much of it has been enacted into law, that if the price is low enough, then our farmers will plant something on which the price is higher. But, Mr. Speaker, the farmer is unable to find commodities today where there is a decent price at all, let alone a higher price. We are witnessing today the distressing fact that this philosophy is a total failure. There is no wisdom at all in forcing our farmers to produce themselves into bankruptcy. We are losing farm families, and the farmland is going into larger operations. These are the facts—it is happening in Iowa—it is happening in every State of the Union.

I have worked on this problem, I have thought on this problem, I have studied this problem perhaps more than any other one single problem in all my life. And after serious deliberation I am thoroughly convinced that our farm people want a farm program which is sensible and one which will do the job of getting prices up off the floor and one which will get production back on an orderly basis. I am convinced that our farmers want only a fair share and I am certain that our city citizens want our farmers to have a fair share. But more than this, I know our farm people well enough to know that they do not want the people in towns to carry a high burden of taxation and pay prices out of reason for food and food products. On both sides there is great desire for fairness and fairness is all that I or anyone else can rightly ask.

What we need and must have, Mr. Speaker, is a farm program which will give a fair price for farm commodities, which will reduce the surplus, which will take fewer tax dollars and which, while doing this will give all our people an adequate diet at a reasonable price. This is the kind of plan I have been working on and one which I intend soon to introduce in bill form. Let me outline some of the features of the bill which I hope to have ready in a matter of just a few days.

First. Under the provisions of this plan the farmer will place 10 percent of his tillable acres in a conservation base on which he would receive no Government pay at all. He would idle these acres as his contribution to cut down production. He would even seed down these acres without cost to the Government.

Second. Each producer will place 25 percent of the remaining tillable acres in the conservation base for which he would receive a payment in kind of surplus crops. The payment in kind would be at a rate of two-thirds of the regular per-acre yield of the farm on which the acres are placed in the conservation base. You see here we will be making the surplus pay itself out of its own problem.

Third. On the remaining acres—which are in fact 67½ percent of the original total—the farmer can plant anything he wants to plant just so long as he does not plant any one crop on more than 50 percent of the total cultivated acres. This gives the farmer the freedom to plant what, where, and when he wants to plant. On these crops the producer qualifies for 90 percent of price supports.

Fourth. There is, under this plan, a $10,000 limit for any one producer for price-support loans.

Fifth. Producers with farms of 30 acres or less can enter or remain out of the program at their option.

Sixth. Those producers violating the provisions of the program will be subject to a penalty of $10 per acre for each of the first 5 acres and $50 per acre for each acre in violation over 5.

Seventh. The Commodity Credit Corporation, when selling surplus commodities for any reason, will be required to purchase equal amounts on the market to place back in storage, in order to stabilize the market unless the price on the commodity sold in the first place is 90 percent of parity or over.

Eighth. This program will be voted by all the producers of wheat, corn, oats, barley, rye, flax, sorghum grains, soybeans, and rice.

Ninth. Tobacco, peanuts, wool, sugar beets, and cotton are not included in this program and the acreage of these commodities is not included in the tillable acreage of this program.

So, in brief, the program does this:

First. It cuts production with the farmer contributing 10 percent of his total tillable acreage. The surplus will pay for more acres placed in the conservation base.

Second. Surpluses will be held off the market unless the price is right.

Third. The farmer will have freedom to plant the crops he wants to plant.

Fourth. This plan will help those who need the help—our family farmers.

Fifth. The price will be raised more by the cutting down of production but also by price supports.

Mr. Speaker, this is a plan which is sensible, which will not be costly, and which will go a long way in solving some of the most complex problems facing America today on the domestic front. I invite consideration and discussion on this subject. I plan to make further remarks about this proposal when the bill is actually ready for introduction.

Mr. BROCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COAD. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. BROCK. I want to compliment the distinguished gentleman from Iowa for his very forceful and intelligent statement. I would like to associate myself with those remarks. I have recently noticed a poll taken by the National Farm magazine, wherein they stated that farmers want no controls whatsoever. However, before coming to Congress in this session I spent 28 years as a farmer. I served as president of the Corn Belt Livestock Feeders Association, which embraces all States from Pennsylvania to Colorado. I believe I know the thoughts of the farmers. The farmer does not want to produce and place his products in surplus. Now the farmer is willing to take a leaf from the pages of General Motors. General Motors does not produce Chevrolets by the thousands and tell their dealers to sell them at whatever they can receive for them. I believe the farmer is willing to produce for the market and is anxious to produce for the market.

I noticed in your No. 1 statement—and I am sure the farmers would agree in this—that they take 10 percent of their tillable acres and do not receive one cent of Government funds. I am sure that if this program is presented to the farmers they will wholeheartedly back that program.

When the distinguished gentleman from Iowa introduces his bill, I would be most happy to introduce a companion bill.

Mr. COAD. I can assure the gentleman he will be afforded that opportunity, and I appreciate his remarks.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COAD. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WOLF. I would like to associate myself with the gentleman's remarks. I would like to say that we in Iowa are proud of the leadership you have given the State of Iowa in the Committee on Agriculture. Certainly your remarks have been thoughts in my mind. I have one regret, however—that we have to think in terms of curtailing production. It appears we are going to have to think seriously in this direction, too; but we also must seek ways to use the food that we have to feed the hungry people around the world.

I want to congratulate the gentleman in presenting this sensible program, and I hope he will continue to study it further.

Mr. COAD. I thank the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WOLF] who knows that I have been interested in a food for peace program for a long time which would take a great amount of our surplus agricultural commodities and put them to a most worthwhile use. As I am sure all will agree the only real reason we have a surplus is that we have not been sufficiently wise or have not planned well enough to make worldwide distribution of what we have by way of food products. When we get our distribution management geared in a proper manner I am sure that our food supplies will be used for food everywhere as they should be.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Iowa certainly deserves praise for meeting the need for a constructure farm program. It is easy enough to criticize Secretary Benson and the Republican administration, but we do not fulfill our obligations unless we come forward with constructive proposals of our own.

The gentleman from Iowa has promised to expand further upon his basic ideas. I shall look forward to this and would hope that he will include in his remarks two things of great interest to those of us in urban areas who recognize the importance of relative prosperity for the agricultural population of our country, and who, at the same time, wish to protect our constituents from rising food prices.

First, I trust the gentleman from Iowa will give us an analysis of the effect, in his estimate, of the proposals he is making, on food prices to the consumer.

And second, that he discuss whether or not it would be advisable for this Congress to initiate a searching inquiry into the spread between the prices received by farmers and the prices paid by consumers. The Committee on Agriculture has conducted, in the past, investigations which resulted in the conclusion that an excessive spread did exist. It would seem high time that we find out why and what should be done about it.

May I again offer my congratulations to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COAD], for his constructive and able leadership in one of our country's most pressing problems.

Mr. COAD. I thank my friend from California, and wish to assure him that I will endeavor to cover the points he has raised when I address the House next Monday on this general subject.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. COAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have permission to revise and extend their remarks following my address.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

INTERNATIONAL EDUCATIONAL COOPERATION

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a concurrent resolution jointly with 31 other Members of the House and 29 Members of the Senate, who are joining the junior Senator from Wyoming, Senator MCGEE. This resolution calls for the development and carrying forward of an expanded program of international educational cooperation.

In light of the excellent statement made in this House earlier today by the Member from Connecticut [Mr. BOWLES] and the discussion that took place, I think it especially appropriate that we place this resolution before the House on this day.

This concurrent resolution calls for the development and carrying forward of an expanded program of international educational cooperation. It calls upon our Government to encourage the United Nations to develop a plan for international educational cooperation that would best serve the needs of the several member countries as well as the cause of world peace and international economic and social development.

It recognizes that this Government possesses substantial sums of foreign currencies which can be used to finance such a program and in effect offers to do so. Actually, we currently possess almost $2 billion in such currencies and if any of the food for peace resolutions become effective or if Public Law 480 is extended, we can expect to accumulate even more.

An educational program of substantial magnitude could be operated using perhaps only 5 percent of these amounts.

The United States has been the beneficiary of a tremendous amount of good will from the Fulbright and Smith-Mundt acts now in operation. Individually these are precedents for this resolution. Similarly, Great Britain has over many years benefited immensely from the good will arising out of the Rhodes scholarships, as Rhodes scholars now serving in the House and Senate could easily attest.

The tragic fact is that many of the other countries of the world have lived in substantial isolation. The countries of Southeast Asia have not enjoyed long and abiding relationships at the cultural and educational level. Indeed, they have had only a minimum of trade relation with each other.

International educational centers in this area would provide a continuing focus of experience for people of neighboring lands. These contacts are free and productive both ways.

Over the years patterns of international cooperation should surely be expected to emerge from such centers. Similarly, the people of the African countries have not enjoyed traffic or contact with each other except to a very limited extent along the fringes.

The development of regional educational centers within this area should be of great benefit toward peaceful development of Africa.

No doubt countries in South and Central America would also welcome the opportunity, within the framework of United Nations planning and support, for creating suitable educational institutions. Anything we can do to help neighbors to know each other within the context of a free and cooperative experience will be most beneficial.

The only time that I have seen Arabs and Israeli in a mood to discuss common problems of the human race in a cooperative spirit was within the context of a group of foreign students exchanging views under educational sponsorship.

Incidentally, this suggests the Middle East as another area in which wider contact under international auspices between citizens of neighboring countries could be productive of a more peaceful development.

So much for the background and philosophy of the resolution, Mr. Speaker.

Let me take just a moment to explain the immediate event which prompts the formation of this resolution. Some of the Members may have noticed the communique from the Council of SEATO—South East Asia Treaty Organization—which appeared in the New York Times on Saturday, April 11.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert the full text of the communique at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

The communique is as follows:

SEATO COUNCIL'S COMMUNIQUE

The fifth meeting of the SEATO Council was held in Wellington from April 8–10, 1959, under the chairmanship of the New Zealand Prime Minister and Minister of External Affairs, the Right Honorable Walter Nash.

The Council is conscious that the security of any one region is linked with that of other areas of the world and that therefore it cannot effectively discharge its responsibilities without taking account of major developments elsewhere.

It accordingly attaches special importance to its annual exchange of views on the general international situation. This year's discussion was considered by Council members to have been extremely valuable. Its freedom and frankness reflect the atmosphere of full confidence and mutual understanding which exist among its members.

SARASIN COMMENDED

The Council discussed reports and recommendations by the Council representatives, the military advisers and the Secretary General, and in the light of them gave directions with regard to the activities of the organization in the coming year. The Council commended the effective work of the Secretary General, Nai Pote Sarasin, and his staff.

The members of SEATO reaffirm their undertaking in article 1 of the Manila treaty to seek the settlement of international disputes by peaceful means, and to refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force in any manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations.

The members of SEATO reemphasized their common determination to resist aggression. They are convinced that SEATO is providing an effective deterrent to aggression and is demonstrating the value of a collective security organization established in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations.

CONFIDENCE INCREASED

They noted that since the establishment of SEATO 4 years ago no aggression against the treaty area has been attempted. Confidence and stability have noticeably increased. This is in marked contrast to the threatening situation which existed when SEATO was formed in September 1954, and is ample evidence of the steadying influence of the alliance.

However, during the past year, developments in the Taiwan Straits of Formosa and elsewhere have demonstrated that the Communists are still prepared to pursue their objectives by violence up to the point where they encounter firm resistance.

Despite the continuing possibility of open aggression, the principal threat to the security and independence of the treaty area now is being presented in more indirect forms. These call for imaginative and varied countermeasures.

Mobility and flexibility have long been characteristic of the SEATO alliance. Similar qualities are being developed in response to the diverse nature of the Communist challenge.

The Council members are aware of the opportunities afforded for subversive activities in situations where basic problems of hunger, lack of opportunity and underdevelopment remain unsolved.

In these circumstances not only ceaseless vigilance, but also positive measures, are the price of freedom.

So far SEATO has done much to publicize and expose throughout the treaty area the objectives toward which subversion is directed and the methods by which it operates.

The SEATO Council remains conscious of continuing danger and has agreed that during the coming year arrangements should be made for the further strengthening of this aspect of SEATO's work. For example, it is proposed that a meeting of experts on countersubversion should be held in Pakistan.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL ACTION

The Council members recognize the needs for continuing action in the economic and social spheres.

Under article 3, SEATO members are pledged to cooperate in the economic field. During the last 4 years considerable progress has been made in the development of economic measures in consonance with treaty objectives.

THE PROBLEM OF POVERTY

It was recognized that the raising of living standards and the provision of opportunity for advancement are important to the security of the area. It was agreed that poverty and underdevelopment are problems affecting several countries in the area and must be dealt with on the broadest possible basis. Account was taken of the substantial volume of aid already afforded under the Colombo plan, United Nations, and bilateral programs.

Special attention is paid by SEATO to questions arising out of treaty commitments. These include shortages of skilled labor, strains resulting from defense preparedness and the needs of underdeveloped areas.

Several multilateral economic activities directed toward solving the above problems now are gaining momentum. A number of skilled labor projects have been started and the SEATO Graduate School of Engineering in Bangkok is scheduled to open in September of this year. With reference to the latter program, additional substantial offers of assistance were accepted with pleasure by the Council.

RURAL CENTERS FORMED

On the initiative of Thailand, the Council representatives were instructed to study the feasibility of setting up in the Asian member countries rural development centers equipped to give vocational guidance and to advise the population on ways and means to improve their livelihood, health, and education and information facilities.

The Council welcomed and approved a U.S. proposal to initiate a special project in cholera research and invited member governments to participate in this project. The Council believes that it would be useful to undertake a concentrated program aiming at assisting in the better control and if possible the eradication of the scourge of cholera.

SEATO is concerned with the study of the effects of Communist economic activities in the treaty area. While the expansion of legitimate trade by all countries of the world is to be encouraged, it is in the interests of international order that where the Communist economic activity is clearly dictated by political motives this should be identified and exposed.

CULTURAL PROJECTS

The Council approved the outlines of a long-term program of multilateral cultural projects which will supplement the substantial bilateral contacts which already exist. Special importance was placed upon the continuance of the award of scholarships, professorships, fellowships, and traveling lectureships in member countries and upon the holding of a conference of leaders of universities.

The Council believes that the present programs have been conspicuously successful and indicate that diversity of culture and tradition can in fact enrich mutual understanding and trust.

The Council noted with special pleasure the progress toward self-government and independence being made in territories administered by member countries. This constitutes a practical example of the manner in which the principles of the Pacific Charter are being fulfilled by member countries.

It illustrates that SEATO's concern for stability and security is no barrier to action by its members to promote political progress and social change.

TIBETAN SITUATION NOTED

The Council noted the stark contrast between these developments and the situation in Tibet and other areas subject to Communist domination.

As members of the free-world community, the members of SEATO share the general concern at developments in Tibet and the widely expressed abhorrence of the violent and oppressive measures employed against the Tibetan people.

The Council noted the report of the Secretary General on his visits to NATO and Baghdad Pact headquarters. They agreed that there was value in the maintenance of contacts of this nature with other collective security organizations faced with similar tasks and problems.

In noting and approving reports of the military advisers and their recommendations for future activities, the Council reaffirmed the necessity for continued planning of defensive measures against possible aggression directed at the treaty area.

During the year Brig. L. W. Thornton of New Zealand assumed the post of Chief of the SEATO Military Planning Office. The Council commended the work done under his leadership which has proved the value of this central and permanent planning machinery.

Further military exercises were held during the past year. All were of a defensive and training character and forces or observers of all member nations participated. Exercises of this nature have special value in improving coordination and the level of training. In the event of the need to resist aggression, SEATO's effectiveness must depend on the ability of its forces to operate together in combination. It was accordingly agreed to continue the program of military exercises during the coming year.

BUDGET PLAN APPROVED

The Council approved budget estimates for the year 1959–60 of $896,860 covering the costs of civil and military headquarters and the various programs undertaken by the organization.

The Council accepted with pleasure an invitation extended by the U.S. Government to hold its next meeting in Washington in 1960.

Members of the Council joined in expressing their regret that illness had prevented the United States Secretary of State, Mr. John Foster Dulles, from attending this fifth meeting. Tributes were paid to the special and long-standing association of Mr. Dulles with the establishment and work of SEATO, and a message of sympathy was sent to him by the Chairman on the Council's behalf. A similar message was sent to Mr. Felixberto Serrano, the Secretary of Foreign Affairs of the Philippines, who had also been prevented by illness from attending the meeting.

The Council expressed its gratitude to the New Zealand Government and the people of Wellington for their hospitality and welcome, and its appreciation of the efficient arrangements made for the conference. The meeting closed with a warm vote of thanks to the Chairman, the Right Honorable Walter Nash.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, the communique includes the following paragraphs which I should like to read here:

CULTURAL PROJECTS

The Council approved the outlines of a long-term program of multilateral cultural projects which will supplement the substantial bilateral contacts which already exist. Special importance was placed upon the continuance of the award of scholarships, professorships, fellowships and traveling lectureships in member countries and upon the holding of a conference of leaders of universities.

The Council believes that the present programs have been conspicuously successful and indicate that diversity of culture and tradition can in fact enrich mutual understanding and trust.

Now, I read at so great length because the graduate school of engineering scheduled to open in Bangkok in September this year is actually being developed under a contract with Colorado State University at Fort Collins in my district.

The director of research of the university visited with me upon his recent return from Bangkok. He reported the great enthusiasm with which the countries of Southeast Asia were welcoming the creation of this graduate school of engineering.

As we talked the matter over, it seemed obvious that this kind of thing should be expanded. There is need for more than graduate engineers. We need teachers colleges to provide the personnel who can train the ordinary citizens in literacy and bring them through elementary and secondary education.

We need to provide a broader base of prospective students for colleges and universities. Many of the smaller nations do not have an adequate base of population or resources to undertake the full range of collegiate and university development.

Regional centers are thus the most practical means as well as the most economic means of providing centers especially for advanced study.

In the week since this resolution was first drafted, I have been pleased at the immediate favorable response it has received. This year is an unusually favorable year within which to take this step forward. Indeed, I feel if we wait much longer, it may be too late.

In light of the discussion earlier this afternoon about the attitude of the American people, I should like to digress for just a moment.

May I call to the attention of the Members of the House the attitudes expressed by a number of persons in the Denver metropolitan area who have taken part in the program "Great Decisions."

Some 600 discussion groups involving some 6,000 persons over a 9-week period discussed the great decisions which face this Nation. Under recent date the director of the Social Science Foundation of the University of Denver. Dr. C. Dale Fuller, sent me a summary of the opinion ballots.

I shall ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD the ballot and responses from the adult vote of some 1,700 persons, because I think Members will be interested in the substantial unanimity among informed citizens from all walks of life with respect to decisions we are here called upon to make.

May I at this point simply recite two or three of the significant points of agreement?

In relation to our Western allies, for example, the voters voted 86 percent for bolder policies to solve economic and social problems in the underdeveloped areas.

Some 88 percent said in relation to the non-Communist underdeveloped world that we should place less emphasis on building the military capacities of the underdeveloped allies and more on their economic and social development.

With respect to the Middle East, 82 percent agreed that the United States has a moral and ethical responsibility to help people of that region realize their aspirations for better health, working and living conditions, and that our help should depend upon the willingness of local leaders to cooperate and commit their own resources.

With respect to Latin America, 79 percent called for the United States to improve educational systems.

With respect to world economic programs, 79 percent would have the United States provide more scholarships to students from underdeveloped areas.

With respect to our general approach to problems of the technological age, 96 percent said the United States should share its scientific and technological skills more extensively with the rest of the world and try to benefit from the knowledge of other advanced nations.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the opinion ballot be printed in full as part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

(k) Greater State and community effort, 84 percent.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, let me now summarize the case for this resolution.

THE CASE FOR AN INTERNATIONAL EDUCATION PLAN WITH UNITED NATIONS SUPPORT

First. The United States has been spending substantial sums to bring foreign students to these shores. This has done a great deal to build bonds of friendship between the United States and citizens of other countries. International educational centers cooperatively sponsored, internationally staffed, with an international student body, located in those regions of the world which do not now have adequate educational institutions, could similarly promote peace among the nations in these regions.

Second. The dollars we might spend to help underwrite a portion of the initial cost would be multiplied many times in the local and regional support for the program, and more people would be educated for the same number of dollars.

Third. Higher education ultimately depends upon an adequate base of elementary and secondary education. Teacher training institutions are vitally necessary to help build this base.

Fourth. The time is now ripe for the creation on an international or regional basis of teachers colleges, other colleges, universities, technical institutions, and graduate schools. The personnel who have been trained since the war offer a broad base of prospective faculty, and international institutions would attract competent faculty from other areas to help in the initiation and development of such schools.

Fifth. Unless international encouragement and support are given in the formative stages of the coming development, we can expect nationalist systems to be developed in many small nations that may be professionally inadequate, and new seedbeds of strident and virulent nationalism will be planted. U.S. cooperation through the United Nations at this point may have a profound influence on the future of Africa, the Middle East, and Southern Asia. If we wait much longer, the opportunity may pass, never to come again.

Sixth. At present, United States loan agencies and United Nations lending agencies and technical assistance agencies are often operating in the dark, or at best in dim light, in many areas. Requests for project loans from across the earth come before committees of these organizations.

If they could secure the benefit of independent objective appraisal of priorities and significance from disinterested scholars and technicians living in and familiar with the regions directly concerned, the effectiveness of these programs would be multiplied many fold.

Moreover, conduct of scholarly research and education within these regions would lead to development of more significant and reasonable proposals. International educational institutions would thus offer tremendous help in the technical assistance and economic development program.

Moreover, they would provide a base of personnel trained in and familiar with the area to help in the carrying forward of these programs.

Seventh. Present methods of training students from underdeveloped areas is subject to certain significant criticisms. Some of the students sent abroad by their countries under cooperative programs become too enamored of the host country. As a result they seek to migrate to the host country, or they have a difficult problem of readjustment in their native country upon return.

Moreover, these students become attached to agencies headed by persons who may have lacked the overseas training. On-the-job tensions have been created because the staff appeared to know more than the boss.

Perhaps more of the leaders should be brought for training overseas in their special areas of interest, while more of the junior staff receive their technical training in regional schools closer to home. This would avoid some of the difficulties that have been observed.

Eighth. The United States is accumulating from appropriations made for other purposes large sums of foreign currencies in various parts of the world. Implementation of the program this resolution calls for would not necessarily require any new funds to be appropriated from the Treasury. Rather, we might spend currencies we own in a way which would do no harm, but great good for all concerned.

Ninth. The resolution proposes that the United States ask the United Nations to develop the detailed plan for an international education program. This way the host and contributing countries would all be a part of the planning operation. We would be planning with and not just planning for people. The plan would be free from the taint of being "Made in America." Passage of this resolution through the Congress would be a great stimulus to the education of the peoples of the world. It would be evidence that we wish to work cooperatively and harmoniously in furthering the cause of international education and understanding.

We cannot expect peace to break out like the dawn of the morning sun rising against the eastern shore. But we can hope to build the edifice of peace brick by brick and block by block. Passage of this resolution should be a most significant addition to the edifice of peace.

In a world hungry for education, our positive offer to lend tangible aid to this noble purpose should prove of inestimable worth.

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. REUSS. I want to congratulate the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON] on his really creative contribution to our foreign policy this afternoon.

A year or two ago when I was out with the International Cooperation Subcommittee in the Far East and particularly in Cambodia, one of the things that impressed me most was some of the very modest United Nations educational missions in which we happily participated, if only in a modest way.

I got the clear impression that if there is one thing for which the people of the underdeveloped regions really hunger and thirst it is the advancement of human endeavor and the beginnings of education.

As the gentleman has correctly said, these things come much more graciously if they have an international flavor to them. I think the gentleman's resolution is well thought out, and I hope it will attract the widest kind of support.

Again I congratulate the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I thank the gentleman. I would note in passing that education is the one thing you can give away without losing. In sharing educational cooperation with other nations, we should also have much to learn.

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I yield.

Mrs. GREEN of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, I share the views just expressed. Certainly ideas are still the most powerful of all missiles. I am sure the resolution which has been introduced and the program the gentleman has outlined will go a long way toward helping us to reach a better understanding between countries.

It certainly would be instrumental in helping to reduce world tensions. It seems to me also it might help us to find other than H-bomb answers to the world conflict.

Mr. Speaker, as I have had previous occasion to say, it still seems apparent to me that ideas are the most potent of missiles. The combined blast and heat and radiation of a dozen H-bombs is not as devastating, nor as determinative of the history of humanity as is the light of one great idea. The Scripture from which we seek and receive inspiration tells us, "You shall seek the truth and the truth shall make you free." How better can we seek the truth; how better serve the truth; how better spread the truth of the justice of our way of life than through a program such as the distinguished and able gentleman from Colorado has today suggested. How better can we use the counterpart funds which are available for such a program. These counterpart funds are now available. They are now put to a number of uses, some of which are not notably contributory to better international understanding.

Mr. Speaker, the absolute essential of any relaxation of international tensions and, which is even more immediate, the absolute essential of any continued international cooperation even among those nations now committed to the defense of freedom, is international understanding. Knowledge of what we stand for is our best source of support for our goals abroad. We have, in the past, sometimes demonstrated a positive genius for putting our worst face forward for the inspection of our potential friends. If the proposal originally sponsored by the gentleman from Colorado is adopted—a proposal, Mr. Speaker, which I am proud to cosponsor—we will have made measurable headway against the strong currents of mistrust and misunderstanding which now threaten to run our ship of state on the rocks of world disaster.

It is possible, as the gentleman from Colorado suggests, that this program might require an initial appropriation. It is equally possible that such a program might be fundable entirely from the existing counterpart funds available to us. In any event, Mr. Speaker, as an alternative to war, as a possible preventive action against the holocaust which we have the power to initiate, but not the power to survive, it is worth every cent it might cost. The cost of this program, Mr. Speaker, like the cost of every bit of the vast mutual security program, is a tiny fraction of the cost of world war III—a cost each of us will pay in terms of death—our own and our children's.

I share with the gentleman from Colorado the deep conviction that no wiser and no more beneficial use could be made of the counterpart funds than in this international education program. I congratulate the gentleman on his leadership in this respect.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I thank the gentlewoman.

Mr. COAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. COAD. As the gentleman from Colorado knows, I have joined with him in the introduction of this resolution. I wish to congratulate him on his presentation here and on his leadership in this very valuable and very worthwhile program.

I think it is certainly necessary in today's world that we extend not only our military might, but that we extend more importantly the might and power of ideas and ideals.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the gentleman also on his resolution, and I am very happy to have been able to join him in introducing this resolution. I think one of the most significant things in the day and times in which we are living is that much of our leadership fail to provide the kind of constructive and imaginative new ideas that the gentleman's resolution calls for.

It seems to me, too, that we have failed as a part of our national policy to make the greatest use of the machinery of the United Nations. In the proposals which the gentleman has outlined so well, it seems to me we would take advantage of the fact that this machinery does exist.

Because of the tensions that are so prevalent in the world today, if we are not imaginative enough to turn our thoughts, especially through the medium of education, to rally the people of the world and the forces of the world against the basic ideas of totalitarianism and behind the basic ideas of freedom and justice as they are exemplified in democracy, then in the end we must lose the fight.

I believe the fight can be won, and I believe the fight will be won if ideas such as the gentleman has expressed and brought forth here today can be implemented and dramatized in such a manner so that they will receive the support not only of our own people but the support of the vast majority of the still free people of the world. Again, I congratulate the gentleman with all my heart.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I thank the gentleman. From all that I have been able to observe, enthusiasm for this kind of thing around the world will be immediate and great. I am optimistic that this program has found its day, and that today is the day.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague, the gentleman from Colorado, my good friend, Mr. JOHNSON. A long time ago at my grandmother's knee, she told me that knowledge is the key to the universe.

I think the eloquent expressions that have been made here today prove our desire to help to make this a reality in many parts of the world. I am glad my distinguished friend has presented his resolution and I am happy to say I am one of those who is with him in this proposal.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I welcome the gentleman as a cosponsor.

Mr. RIVERS of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. RIVERS of Alaska. Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself with my colleague, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON]. I, too, have joined in introducing this resolution.

I would like to emphasize a little more the point made by the gentleman from Oregon about the use of counterpart funds. Not so long ago I was talking with a representative of the Department of Agriculture who made no less than a trip around the world talking to the leaders of the various countries, mostly underdeveloped countries, in regard to whether they might not carry on and find the needed scientists over there to carry out a supplemental program and pay these people with counterpart funds.

The gentleman's idea is to utilize the resources lying dormant and which are only good in the particular countries which have issued this particular money.

So I commend the gentleman for a most constructive effort, and I am happy to be joined in this effort with the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I thank the gentleman. Let me speak further about the question of the costs.

For example, it costs $30,000 to $35,000 to bring a foreign student to this country and maintain him through a 4-year college course and get him back home again. The same amount of money being spent overseas would probably finance 10 students.

More than that, the amount of money which I would envision Congress providing through counterpart funds would be only a fraction of the total amount which would be spent by the cooperating countries in such a program.

Therefore, whatever dollars we made available would be multiplied manyfold as those countries gained interest in and enthusiasm for the program.

That is why I was so happy to see the SEATO communique, which confirmed what my friend told me to be the reaction in Southeast Asia. Not everyone graduated is an engineer, and we should be cooperating over a wider area.

This investment will simply be using part of the investment we have already made in acquiring counterpart funds.

We could not spent a hundred million dollars in this purpose in the next year if we wanted to. This program requires but a small amount of money, yet it is tremendously rich in its significance.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. GEORGE. I want to congratulate the gentleman from Colorado. I am wondering if it might not be possible to have some of the extravagance cut out in our foreign policy.

One of the things that comes to my mind is our development in foreign countries. Our diplomats are not able to speak the language of those countries. It seems to me if this program is in effect it might iron out some of those difficulties.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I thank the gentleman for his observations. There is no question but that if our lending and technical assistance agencies would have had faculties and a student body familiar with the areas where these programs operate, much of the waste now observed would have been eliminated. Necessarily, under the actual circumstances, there was much waste.

In the long run this program should certainly do much to help reduce that, and to render the programs far more effective. I am hopeful that we will be planting seeds which will bear much fruit within the countries themselves, and that there will be less pressure upon us to provide funds.

Mr. GEORGE. May I say I am proud to join the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. BURNS of Hawaii. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. BURNS of Hawaii. I want to join with those who are complimenting the gentleman for his distinguished contribution to the thinking of this Congress and the United States. I had the pleasure to cosponsor the resolution with him. I pointed out during the consideration of the Hawaii statehood matter that in the people of Hawaii we have had a competent resource, particularly in this field of which the gentleman is speaking, the educational field, and in the developing of an understanding which comes about by the mutuality of interests.

I was this morning advised, for example, that one of my constituents, Mr. James S. Miyake, had been appointed executive director of the National Educational Foundation in Bangkok for 1959.

The University of Hawaii has been a center through which many of these foreign students have graduated or have matriculated. In this connection I would like to point out that the distinguished, very able, and most knowledgeable Senate majority leader, LYNDON JOHNSON, on Friday gave a speech which touches upon the point raised by the gentleman today, and also points raised by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BOWLES] in his speech earlier this afternoon.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the speech referred to be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

(The matter referred to is as follows:)

POSITIVE STEPS IN FOREIGN POLICY

(Address by Senate Democratic Leader LYNDON B. JOHNSON before the Women's National Press Club banquet for the American Society of Newspaper Editors, Washington, D.C., April 16, 1959)

Madam Chairman, Mr. Ambassador, distinguished editors, ladies and gentlemen, throughout our national experience, the month of April has been a month of history for Americans.

Our Congress met for the first time in April 180 years ago. General Washington was inaugurated as President in the same month.

Ninety-four years ago yesterday, Lincoln died here in Washington. And 14 years ago last Sunday, Franklin D. Roosevelt passed away at Warm Springs.

Our Civil War began in April 1861—and ended in April 1865. Fifty-two years later, in April of 1917, a man from the South, Woodrow Wilson, asked the United States to enter the war to make the world safe for democracy. And in April of 1945, men met at San Francisco to unite nations in the quest for world peace.

But of all our April anniversaries, the one which most directly affects our generation is the one which passes with the least notice. It comes next Wednesday when we enter the 13th year of the cold war.

It was on the 22d of April 1947 that the Senate approved legislation to implement the Truman doctrine. That was our official recognition of the situation into which Soviet communism had plunged the world.

My assignment tonight is to speak on positive aspects of foreign policy. I am joined in this assignment by a man who has made as many positive contributions to a stable and free world as any other—Ambassador Carlos Romulo.

STRONGHOLDS OF FREEDOM

The cold war has been on our part essentially a defensive struggle. We are attempting to hold fast the strongholds of freedom against the aggressions of communism. In that sense, our position at times has seemed negative.

But it is impossible to discuss positive aspects—or any other aspects—of foreign policy today except against the background of the cold war. It is the compelling fact of our day.

Although our position has been defensive, it has been imaginative and bold.

INITIATIVE AND GOOD FAITH

We have shown initiative—as in the Marshall plan, the Truman doctrine, point 4, and NATO. We have displayed courage—as in Iran, the Berlin airlift, Korea, and Lebanon. We have exhibited good faith—as in our dealings with nations we could have held as colonies.

But to a great extent, our polices have been motivated by sheer reaction to the probing thrusts of Soviet communism into the free world. And because of that motivation, we have tended to forget what should be the true moral basis of our policy.

There has been a tendency to say that we send food to India because we want to win that nation over to our side.

There has been a disposition to say that we send technicians to southeast Asia because we want to halt the spread of communism.

IGNOBLE MOTIVES AND NOBLE DEEDS

There has been a readiness to exchange students with Europe because we wish to spread our ideas.

We have been ascribing ignoble motives to noble deeds. And in doing so, we have given the world the impression that we are bidding for friendship as traders bid for a sack of wheat.

Such an impression is an open invitation for those whose friendship we seek to shop around and see what the man on the other side of the street is willing to offer.

I think it is about time for us to change not our policy but our attitudes. I think it is about time for us to start proceeding on the assumption that we do things not because they are expedient but because they are right.

If we send food to India, we should do so because people are hungry and we have a surplus.

If we send technicians to southeast Asia, we should do so because people need help and we have the necessary skills.

If we exchange students with Europe, we should do so because we wish to exchange knowledge.

A HANDSHAKE, NOT A TIP

The world wants America to reach out its hand for a handshake, not to leave a tip. That is the kind of America we must be.

It is fashionable, in discussing foreign policy, to call for bold, new ideas. Such ideas are always welcome—although we must never confuse mere novelty with real merit. But I suspect our problems will be solved eventually by the vigorous and imaginative application of policies we already have in force. Some of them date back for many years.

In another April, 69 years ago, there was formed in this hemisphere the International Union of American Republics. Our Secretary of State, addressing that convention, expressed our purposes this way:

"We believe that a spirit of justice, of common and equal interests between the American States, will leave no room for an artificial balance of power like unto that which has led to wars abroad and drenched Europe in blood."

This concept applies to our times and our challenges today.

JUSTICE AMONG NATIONS

We do not seek anything in this world other than justice among nations. We are not setting as our goal a precarious balance of power which will maintain not peace but a fearful and uneasy stalemate.

We must rest the alliance of freemen on a common interest in mankind's well-being rather than on the common bond of fear.

Our country will soon enter important conferences which may settle the destiny of the world. We are entering those conferences, unfortunately, without the services of a great and dedicated American who has borne the foreign policy burden for many years.

It is conceivable that those conferences will settle many problems. It is to be hoped that they will relax some of the tensions which now threaten to blow the world apart.

But even if those conferences should settle all questions of armaments, past treaties and boundaries—and as reasonable men we know this is doubtful—we should still be faced by a Communist challenge vital to our survival.

THE TWOFOLD CHALLENGE

The challenge is twofold: the economic challenge of trade and the moral challenge of understanding the people of the earth who remain outside the struggle of East and West.

Khrushchev has boasted that the Soviet Union will destroy us in economic competition. Khrushchev is no idle braggart.

And the Soviets have been working for years among the uncommitted people of the earth. It would be foolish to pretend that their work has not been effective.

To meet the challenge of trade will not be easy. It will require first exploration of the thinking of our fellow free nations to determine what steps can be taken to bring about economic unity.

To meet the challenge of human understanding, however, will be far more difficult than meeting the challenge of trade. For too many years, we have neglected the simple things that would break down the barriers between ourselves and the people who should be our friends.

LANGUAGE BARRIERS

For example, languages spoken by hundreds of millions of people all over the earth are hardly known in our land. The official languages of nations like the Union of South Africa, Korea, the Philippines, Pakistan, and others, are taught nowhere in the United States.

Our printing presses produce nothing that most of the world's population can read.

There are intellectual walls which must be broken down if we are to have mutual understanding. And there are ways of breaking down those walls.

Why don't we foster truly international centers of learning where the world's best and most mature minds can meet and exchange ideas?

We have the facilities; we have the scholars; we even have the sites.

We have recently taken an historic step in the development of our Nation. A group of mid-Pacific islands will soon share all the rights and responsibilities of the other 49 States in the Union.

The Hawaiian Islands lie astride the trade routes of the Pacific. Many of the people have close ties to the countries of the Far East. They enjoy the advantages of a university of stature and prestige.

AN INTERNATIONAL UNIVERSITY

Why do we not establish in Hawaii an international university as a meeting place for the intellectuals of the East and the West?

Why do we not seek to attract scholars and students alike from both the Orient and the Occident?

Hawaii could be the place at which professors from Harvard, Chicago, California, and all our great universities could meet with the learned men of Tokyo, Manila, Indonesia, Southeast Asia, India, and Pakistan.

The great teachers of Asia could impart their learning to students from the West. And professors from the Western Hemisphere could lay before students of Asia the knowledge that has been gained in our part of the world.

In Hawaii, barriers of language would evaporate rapidly. People would gain new understanding and new respect for each other. And the intellectual association would benefit all mankind.

This is a concept which I have discussed many times with the distinguished and able Delegate from Hawaii, John Burns. It is a concept which we could put into actuality at a fraction of the cost of the weapons which we now ship to other nations of the world.

A PRACTICAL IDEA

That this is a practical idea has been demonstrated already by the University of Puerto Rico.

Under the American flag, and the wise leadership of Muñoz-Marín, the University of Puerto Rico has been building a bridge of understanding between us and the people of Latin America. A door to mutual understanding has been opened.

We have learned of the vital importance of the rich Spanish cultural heritage. And the Latin Americans have learned the truth about our hearts and our souls.

The University of Puerto Rico has been such a tremendous success that it has led the Senator from Montana, MIKE MANSFIELD, and the Senator from Florida, GEORGE SMATHERS, to propose a University of the Americas. And it is an idea which has great appeal.

Hawaii, a bright, new star in our flag, could also become a bridge spanning the Pacific.

We must not underestimate the importance of this bridge. The Communists long ago realized that the destiny of mankind could be settled in Asia. Leon Trotsky, the Bolshevik theoretician, said:

"The road to Paris and London might lead through Kabul, Calcutta, and Bombay."

COMMUNIST CONQUEST

The Communists exiled and assassinated Leon Trotsky. But they did not exile this idea. And one of the greatest single blows that has ever been dealt against the free world was the Communist conquest of 650 million Chinese—who are gaining at the rate of 13 million people a year.

Compared to the people of Asia, our population is a drop in the bucket. There are 400 million Indians increasing at the rate of 7 million a year. Eighty million people inhabit the Indonesian chain. When these are added to the millions of Japan, Korea, southeast Asia and the Middle East, totaling 1,500 million, this means our 175 million is a very small minority in this world.

THE CHALLENGE BEFORE US

For the challenges before us, we need both new ideas and old boldness. But our future lies not in the multiplicity of ideas but in singleness of purpose.

That singleness of purpose must be dedication to the concept that this can be a better and freer world for all the nations.

That is not a goal which can be achieved in one night or by one idea or even by one policy. But it is a goal which is attainable if America assumes not just the political and military but the moral leadership which should be ours.

Mr. BURNS of Hawaii. I thank the gentleman for allowing me this opportunity of presenting this speech of the distinguished majority leader of the Senate, and for contributing in a small way to the program he advocates.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I thank the gentleman. Certainly an International Educational Institution in Hawaii would be a wonderful setting in which Asians could learn more about America under conditions which would make transition easier. I believe that could be done under the wording of my resolution, and it is thoroughly in keeping with the purpose.

Mr. BURNS of Hawaii. I think they mutually support each other.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, at this point I wish to include a copy of the concurrent resolution to which I referred:

Whereas the United States has benefited greatly from the exchange of students between our own country and other countries through the Fulbright Acts and Smith-Mundt Acts; and

Whereas the other nations of the world have in recent years experienced remarkable growth in the number of persons trained through the operations of these and similar programs; and

Whereas increasing the level of education and attainment of the peoples of the world is the most productive investment that the nations of the world can make for the well-being of all mankind; and

Whereas international educational programs enhance international understanding and thereby promote the cause of peace; and

Whereas the cause of peace can be served by increasing cooperation among peoples of other nations in the pursuit of educational attainment; and

Whereas many nations or regions of the world not now possessing universities, colleges, and technical institutes are now on the threshold of readiness to create and operate such universities, colleges, and technical institutes: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States hereby expresses its interest in encouraging the development of international educational programs, both graduate, including regional graduate schools, and undergraduate, including teachers colleges, technical institutes, as well as other colleges and universities; and be it further

Resolved, That the Congress hereby recommends that the U.S. Government encourage the United Nations organization through its special fund or otherwise to undertake to develop a plan for international educational cooperation that would best serve the needs of the several member countries, as well as the cause of world peace and international economic and social development; and be it further

Resolved, That the Congress hereby expresses its willingness to accept a reasonable share of the cost of bringing into operation certain aspects of such a plan through the use of foreign currencies available for these uses, or otherwise as may prove suitable and desirable.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include the full text of a resolution and other extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who desire to do so may have permission to extend their remarks on this topic at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. EDMONDSON). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. HECHLER. Mr. Speaker, I want to concur heartily with the excellent presentation put forward in support of this bill by the able gentlemen who are cosponsoring this measure. I believe that they have shown effectively how this resolution can shore up America's participation in international cooperative educational plans and correct some of the flaws which have become apparent in the instrumentation of these otherwise praiseworthy ventures.

The establishment of the international education centers contemplated by this resolution would indeed keep students from underdeveloped countries from becoming "to enamoured of the host country," as my distinguished cosponsor, the gentleman from Colorado, so wisely put it. It also would be an effective force in uprooting the seeds of nationalism that all too often are planted in the universities of underprivileged countries which have contained their educational efforts to their own frontiers.

But while these benefits would accrue to America's favor in helping to remove the "Made in U.S.A." label from some of our cooperative plans, I would like to state that I seriously believe that another great benefit for Americans would evolve from the participation of our own students in this program.

For one thing, Americans training with foreign students under existing programs have always shared the burden—even as these foreign students have—of being either vastly in the majority or vastly in the minority. In our own schools, where foreign students comprise perhaps 3 percent of the student body, the American student has had little chance for ample contact, on both the informal academic and the social levels, that is so necessary for real understanding of our guests.

Conversely, when the American student ventures abroad to study, he finds the situation reversed—and perhaps even intensified by the auro of glamor—often coupled with distrust—which seems to surround the postwar American wherever he goes.

There certainly would be much to be said for a program such as would be provided by the fulfillment of this resolution. This program would export our innocents abroad, where they could participate as a small percentage of a student body that would consist of no dominant national group. I believe that they would return matured by informal debate, hardened by coequal social contact, and much better prepared to advise their fellow Americans of the harsh realities in the world as it exists beyond our shores.

I feel that the implementation of the terms of this resolution would be of infinite benefit to our own students who venture into the rough-and-tumble of an international student body, as well as providing the many benefits which my worthy colleagues have mentioned before me.

HOME RULE FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. EDMONDSON). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FOLEY] is recognized for 90 minutes.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have requested time today to discuss the vital question of home rule for the District of Columbia. Several distinguished Members of this House have made valuable comments on legislation to effectuate home rule for the District of Columbia on previous occasions. I have, myself, alluded to my own deep convictions in this matter and indicated my immediate interest in home rule on this floor earlier in the session. I wish to amplify my earlier remarks today.

Along with many of my colleagues in the House of Representatives, I am an attorney. As a lawyer, I am inclined to be interested in precedents when it comes to solving problems. I think it might be very helpful in considering home rule for Washington to look for a moment at the past. What has history indicated in this connection? What experience of the past can we draw upon in our deliberations on this problem today?

Along with others in this House, I have introduced legislation to provide home rule for the District. It would establish a territorial form of government for Washington. It is an agreed bill to the extent that it has broad bipartisan support and approval from the White House.

However, this proposal is conceived by some people as a radically new departure from established institutions. The fact is, of course, that it is not new. The District of Columbia enjoyed self-government until 1874, and for several of those early years operated under a territorial form of government not unlike the one proposed in the present legislation.

The historical facts may be well known, but they are worth reciting for purposes of refreshment and illustration. The establishment of a Federal district was provided for in the United States Constitution. In 1790 and 1791, the Congress passed acts establishing the District of Columbia, which at that time included area ceded by the States of Maryland and Virginia. Maryland ceded the incorporated town of Georgetown and portions of Montgomery and Prince Georges Counties. The territory included in the Virginia cession included the county and city of Alexandria.

The cession laws of Maryland and Virginia provided that the areas ceded should function under the respective State laws until Congress could set up a government. Finally, in 1802, Congress granted the city of Washington its first charter which incorporated the area and divided it into three wards. The structure of the government of Washington in that first charter included a council of 12 members elected annually by the qualified voters in the city. The elected 12 selected 5 from among them to serve as a second chamber. The mayor was appointed annually by the President of the United States. In 1804 the composition of both houses of the council was changed to nine, and was altered again in 1812 when provision was made for the election of the mayor by the council. In 1820 the charter of Washington was revised to require the biennial election of the mayor by the people, and the government of the city remained in substantially this form until the 1870's.

An instructive event took place with respect to the District in 1846. In that year, Congress received petitions urging the retrocession of the county and city of Alexandria to Virginia. The area ceded by Virginia had not been used by the Federal Government for public buildings up to that time. But more important, we are told, the Virginia populace felt prejudiced in that they had been disenfranchised except for local suffrage. Thus, late in 1846 Congress gave Alexandria city and county back to Virginia.

On February 21, 1871, Congress reorganized the government of the District of Columbia. It established institutions similar to those provided for U.S. territories. The entire District was created a municipal corporation, and executive authority was vested in a Governor appointed by the President. Legislative power was vested in a legislative assembly composed of a council and a house of delegates, the council appointed by the President and the house of delegates elected by the people. The Governor had the veto power, which could be overriden by a two-thirds vote of the assembly. The legislative assembly had a broad grant of power to deal with matters in the District, but all acts of the assembly were at all times subject to repeal or modification by the Congress of the United States.

The territorial government established for the District of Columbia barely had a chance to breathe life before it was struck down by its enemies. The Board of Public Works established in the act providing for a territorial form of government came under heavy criticism, and financial difficulties as a result of the panic of 1873 gave opponents of the new government an opportunity to bury it.

The law of 1871 provided for a delegate from the District of Columbia to the House of Representatives. For 4 years Washington citizens had their own elected Representative to the United States Congress. His name was Norton P. Chipman. Though his service in these hallowed Halls was short, Norton

Chipman served his District well at a time when it was under severe attack. His classic defense of territorial government in the District of Columbia is to be found in the official records of the 42d Congress of the United States. He took the floor of this House on May 27, 1872, to defend free government in his city. He opened his remarks by saying that—

The relation of the District toward the National Government has not changed; in no one particular is the national property affected by it. Congress retains the power to annul any of the acts of our legislature, or to wipe out the local government utterly, as it did in abolishing the charters of our cities in establishing the new government.

Not a foot of the national property is subject to taxation or placed under the slightest control of the local government, except that the control of the streets and avenues was by the act turned over to the Board of Public Works as the agent of the National Government. Instead of going to Congress, as we heretofore did, for general legislation of a local character, Congress relieved itself by creating a Legislative Assembly with delegated powers, and authorized it to create such officers and pass such laws, with certain exceptions, as were necessary to operate the new government.

Congressional opponents of the new government for Washington were severely critical of the Board of Public Works, and claimed that the new government was opposed by a thousand citizens. Norton Chipman, in his pungent and flowing oratorical style, defended the city against these critics. Let me illustrate from his speech the character of his defense:

Our organic act became a law in February 1871, and early in March the Governor, Board of Public Works, and other appointive officers were qualified. They began at once to organize the new government, so that at the expiration of the old charter, which by the act was to take place on the 1st of June, there should be no interregnum and no lack of power to carry on the necessary functions of the new government. * * * Meanwhile the Board of Public Works was devising a plan of improvements embracing the whole District of Columbia. * * * The plans were completed and the general outline approved by members of the advisory board. They involved an expenditure of about $6 million, one-third of which being paid by the property abutting on the streets, left $4 million to be raised by the legislature.

Immediately upon the organization of the legislature the Governor sent in a message to that body submitting the plans and suggesting a loan of $4 million by creating a bonded debt to run for 20 years payable by a sinking fund. This bold innovation upon the old-fashioned way of raising money from year to year, and expending it without plan or purpose, startled the "one thousand citizens," who, according to my colleague, embody all the wisdom and virtue the District possesses, and they organized to put down this reckless encroachment upon ancient custom and upon this annihilation of the delights of fogyism.

The effort to defeat the legislation was unsuccessful, but the "one thousand" were able to get work on the public improvements stopped by means of a court order.

The legislature, not disposed to surrender the rights and interests of 130,000 citizens to the whims and prejudices of 1,000, passed another four million loan act to be submitted to the people. This passed August 19, 1871. * * *

Then began one of the most relentless and bitter attacks that ever disgraced a community. These 1,000; aping New York and thereby seeking also to throw around the canvass the infamy of the New York Tammany ring, organized a committee of 70. Some respectable names were put forward as officers of the Citizens Association, and other decent people consented to go on the committee of 70, but the dirty, disgraceful work was performed by men who had neither social, business, nor official standing in the community.

A libelous sheet was started called the Citizen, and was supported by the money of persons who had not the courage to be responsible for its management. Every issue of the paper was full of abuse * * * but its editor was wholly irresponsible, and as exempt from suit as any other sewer pipe in the city. If he had been a heap of dung he could not have been more pestiferous.

The result was that when the vote came the 1,000 citizens and a few recruits making 1,213 voted against the loan, and 14,760 voted for it.

But the opponents of the city's financial policies continued working against the policies of the new government, and, according to Norton Chipman, succeeded in seriously undermining the credit of city bonds.

These 1,000 citizens, having lost a free election, petitioned the Congress. A subsequent congressional investigation was unfavorable, and, finally, in 1874, Congress abolished the territorial form of government for the District of Columbia and substituted rule by three Commissioners appointed by the President.

Mr. Speaker, I have recited these historical facts to show that the efforts to establish home rule for the District of Columbia under our bill is nothing more than to re-create the form of government which Norton Chipman defended so eloquently on May 27, 1872. Nearly a million people live in the 69 square miles of Washington, the Capital of a Nation which has consistently reaffirmed its belief in the principle of self-government.

We have lately conferred first-class citizenship upon our brothers in Alaska and Hawaii. Yet at our very doorstep a million of our people are still second-class citizens. We can do no less than to give them the franchise, and to permit them to manage their purely local affairs through their own representatives.

Mrs. DWYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentlewoman from New Jersey.

Mrs. DWYER. Mr. Speaker, it is instructive to note that Senator HARTKE, the new chairman of the Senate District Judiciary Subcommittee, took little more than 3 months from the day Congress convened to begin Senate hearings on home rule for Washington, D.C. They began on April 15.

But we have yet to hear a similar announcement from the District of Columbia Committee in this body, although there are at least 24 home-rule bills before it. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, our committee has failed to report a bill on any of the four occasions in the last 10 years when Senate-approved bills were referred to it.

There may be a good deal to say for due deliberation, Mr. Speaker, but by the same token there is a good deal to be said against deliberate delay—which seems to be the situation when it comes to home rule for the District. This delay deliberately ignores the wishes of the 24 home rule bill sponsors; it ignores the District Commissioners who emphasized their support for home rule by placing it first on their list of 34 legislative proposals to the 86th Congress in their annual state of District message; it ignores the great majority of our American people who feel that the people of Washington have every right to govern themselves; and, of course, it ignores the platforms of both major political parties.

While we continue to delay, Mr. Speaker, we must recognize the consequences of our failure to leave the business of running the municipal government to the residents, property owners, and taxpayers of the District of Columbia—the city's true body politic. Without a doubt one serious consequence is that the National Government becomes responsible for doing the local work of the District government.

Mr. WIER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. WIER. I am very happy to hear the gentlewoman's last comment. I was elected to Congress in 1948. When I came here I did not anticipate that I would be acting as alderman for the city of Washington, but that is what happened to me. I have been on the Committee on the District of Columbia for 4 years. I know every Member of Congress ought to know that those of us who serve on the District Committee have many more important responsibilities here in the Congress than trying to administer the minor affairs of the District of Columbia in every legislative field. I do not believe I was sent here to spend half a morning on school board affairs, police affairs, public works affairs, and so forth. So I join with the gentleman from Maryland and the gentlewoman from New Jersey in hoping that I will live long enough so that someday I shall see the House Committee on the District of Columbia report out some type of home-rule bill for the District.

Mrs. DWYER. I thank the gentleman. I was just ready to develop what the gentleman had to say.

It's a job we did not campaign for, Mr. Speaker, but the fact remains that every time we win election to Congress we also win a second victory—a seat on the "city council" of Washington, D.C.

This is no little job. The Legislative Reference Service estimated that it takes Congress "some 6,000 man-hours of time and $2 million per session" to manage District affairs.

In the course of 6,000 hours of council meetings this session, Mr. Speaker, we shall have to decide whether "meter-maids" are the answer to parking-meter problems. And we must weigh the advantages of adding $4,000 worth of fender piling at the end of pier No. 5—which, by way of identification, is now being used by the city fireboat.

When we have those matters settled, we must consider the problem of a defective heating system at the morgue, and the question of how much money to spend for Watergate concerts next year. In addition, Appropriation Committee hearings contain 1,000 more pages of other details in city administration—details that the people of Pittsburgh, Boise, Atlanta, Elizabeth, N.J., and every other American city, except Washington, take care of for themselves.

Home rule would go a long way toward restoring true city government and self determination to the people of Washington, and it would throw all of us out of a city council seat we have no business holding in the first place.

We have had 10 years and more of due deliberation, Mr. Speaker. Let us not delay any longer. Let us act on home rule now.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. UDALL. It is a pleasure to join in this discussion and I commend both the gentleman from Maryland and the gentlewoman from New Jersey on their very pointed and persuasive remarks. I can heartily say with the great majority of our colleagues here that we have been elected to the House, and that is the important thing.

Mr. Speaker, before I make my own brief remarks, I ask unanimous consent that the delegate from Hawaii [Mr. BURNS] may extend his remarks in the RECORD at this point.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. EDMONDSON). Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BURNS of Hawaii. Mr. Speaker, I am indeed happy to join with the distinguished gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FOLEY], in his endeavor on behalf of the restoration of self-government for the people of the District of Columbia. I do not intend to speak on the merits of any particular legislation. I do want, on behalf of my constituents who have been so recently so fairly treated by the American people and their representatives, the 86th Congress, to express the support of Hawaii of the legitimate aspirations of fellow Americans for the right to run their own affairs.

Writing of his investigation into the American Revolution, Alexis de Toqueville said:

> Municipal institutions constitute the strength of free nations. A nation may establish a system of free government but without municipal institutions it cannot have the spirit of liberty.

An essential element of the American way of life has been the spirit of liberty which has manifested itself in so many ways to the benefit of our social, economic, and political institutions. Americans must preserve this spirit of liberty they are most fortunate to enjoy as a result of the vision and practical effort of their forefathers.

Our recognition of its source should strengthen our determination to examine and reexamine our institutions to make certain that we maintain and develop the forms of government by which it is developed. This calls for self-government at the level of peoples' living together in a community. With this in mind, reasonable men can agree on legislation by which this purpose can be accomplished.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the argument for home rule for the District of Columbia is so overpowering that there really is no answer. Indeed, I consider it significant that those, whoever they may be on either side of the aisle who are opposed to home rule, are not here to participate in this discussion today.

Certainly, the 85th Congress and its successor the 86th Congress, which is now in session, have shown remarkable concern for the rights of self-government for citizens of our great Nation. The fact that we did act, after a period of over 40 years to enlarge the Union from 48 States to 49 States and now again we have brought in not only another State, but an area which is more than 2,000 miles from the mainland of this continent, indicates a broadening interest and concern in the Congress and in the country in the right of people to work out their own destiny. Yet, ironically, it is here at the very seat of government and in the very shadow of the Capitol that we do not permit self-government. As one who has spent many, many hours not in considering the minor affairs of the Capital, but in studying the subject of American education and of the things to be done, it has been my experience in the past that every time we come to the floor with an education bill, the cry is raised about Federal control of schools. Well, it flabbergasted me to find out within the past week how the school board of the District of Columbia is constituted and how the members of the school board get office. Since we have not given these nearly a million people the right to elect a school board, the way they do in every other community in the United States, how then is their school board selected? This is very fascinating when you consider the way the cry of Federal control and Federal dictation of schools goes up. They are appointed by the Federal judges.

This is a very anomalous situation—and I am not saying the Federal judges have not done a pretty good job because I think the school board's record is good. It is astounding to think that in the United States of America today something that is as close to the people as a school board which makes school policy, appoints schoolteachers and school administrators, and makes determinations on important matters with regard to the education of the young, that this is dictated—and I do not think that any other word is quite appropriate because we have reposed the authority there—and the authority to select school board members resides strictly in Federal hands. So this Federal control of schools, which so many people are concerned about when it comes to aid-to-education legislation apparently does not concern them at all, when it comes down to the problem of the schools of the people who live within a stone's throw of the Capitol.

Therefore, it seems to me the time has come, if we really believe in States' rights—which properly defined is local self-government really—and if we really believe in the basic, democratic idea that people at every level of society shall have, insofar as is possible, the right to work out their own will and their own destiny—then the time has come to grant home rule to the District of Columbia.

Unless I mistake the temper of the House and the temper of this Congress, I think that this Congress will put another feather in its cap in addition to the one we have for our action with regard to Hawaii and that we will—I hope before this session is concluded—see home rule granted to the District of Columbia.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LINDSAY. I would like to compliment the gentleman from Maryland, the gentlewoman from New Jersey, and the gentleman from California on their remarks on this all-important subject. I am not a member of the District of Columbia Committee, yet I have followed this subject more or less closely for some years in the past.

Prior to the time I came to Congress I was a resident of the District of Columbia in a different capacity. I wondered at that time why it was that citizens of this District were denied the power and the right and authority to take care of their own housekeeping problems. I continue to wonder why. Now, as a Member of Congress I assume it my privilege to at least say a few words which I hope will do something to encourage the leadership of the House to see to it that this measure is brought to the floor for debate.

This is the fifth time in 10 years that a Senate-passed bill to provide home rule for the District has been before us, and yet in all this time the House has not had an opportunity to debate or vote on the issue. Surely, it seems to me, 10 years is long enough to keep this measure from coming to the floor. There have not been any hearings on this side of Capitol Hill on home rule during all this period. It is very likely that there are votes in the membership sufficient to pass this measure on the floor. I cannot be sure, because we never have had a chance to vote on it, but certainly there is a majority that believes in democratic principles, and that home rule should at least have a hearing and a vote. The basic issue is whether this body is master of its own house.

I do not think this home rule question should be left unanswered any longer. We should have an opportunity to have a hearing and discuss it and have fair debate on the floor within the very near future. The wishes of the people of this community for home rule have been stultified for many years. No one as yet has been able to persuade me that there is any reason why we should not have complete confidence in the capacity of these people to deal autonomously with strictly local matters, primarily affecting their own community.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I am happy to join in cosponsoring a bill for home rule, and I welcome the remarks which the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FOLEY] has made.

Some years ago I was a resident of the District of Columbia and I have some sympathy in the wishes of the voteless residents who live here. Now I live in a suburban area and I find myself on the city council of this city, and that seems an anomalous situation.

Certainly the people here may think we are not disposed to consider this proposition. If the Congress can complete the job, as we have done with Hawaii and Alaska, and can demonstrate that we can plead in both Houses for home rule for the District of Columbia, then we should be a little more proud to be Members of Congress.

I thank the gentleman.

Mr. FOLEY. I thank the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. WIDNALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. WIDNALL. Mr. Speaker, I, too, would like to join in complimenting the gentleman from Maryland, who has just spoken in favor of a home rule bill for the District of Columbia. When I first became a Member of Congress in 1950 I found that this was a problem that had confronted the country for many, years before. It interested me to the extent that I introduced a bill at that time providing for a measure of home rule for the people of Washington. It seems to me that a hydrogen bomb or atomic weapon is something of a holding weapon. We are not doing anything at all to capture the minds of the people of the free world or the world behind the iron curtain. We handicap ourselves immeasurably, for it is known throughout the world that we do not have enough confidence in our own people to give the franchise to those who live in our Capital City. It is a national disgrace that this privilege has not been granted up to now.

The votes on the Alaskan statehood and the Hawaii statehood bill, as has been very ably pointed out by two of the previous speakers, seem to indicate a growing up for the United States and for its people in the Congress. The bills as they were debated in the Congress during the present session, it seems to me, were debated without bias, without prejudice and the rancor and feeling that had taken place in previous years, which indicates that there is a growing understanding and a better understanding of our problems and what should be done with respect to our own people.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me about time that the forces of moderation and compromise gain some voice in this House on the issue of home rule for the District of Columbia.

Now we have a bill before us that represents a conscientious and generous attempt to find a moderate, middle ground solution to this problem, one that concedes as much to any legitimate objection as can be conceded and still make some progress on this problem. Many of those who support the Multer-Springer Bill, as introduced by members of the District Committee and many other members of both parties, have made a sacrifice of their own preferences to do so. Many would prefer a bill that went much farther in granting suffrage to the District.

In spite of their feelings, these Members of the House have endorsed this legislation as a middle-ground measure which attempts to meet reasonable fears and objections. They are willing to engage in the kind of conciliation that is necessary in a democratic system. But they expect opponents to be reasonable, too.

This bill has every possible protection of the national interest and of Congress' power to supervise the government of the District. It provides for a Governor nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate who obviously will have a strong sense of his responsibility to Congress and the Nation. It provides not one but two vetoes over the actions of the legislative assembly. The President can veto the actions of the local government. Congress itself, at any time, can veto the actions of the local government. Congress will continue to have the control and influence that goes with annual appropriation of the Federal contribution to the District. And finally, it is obvious that if the local government is unsatisfactory, Congress can always undo what it has done and return to congressional government.

I hope that will never happen. With all the safeguards in this bill, I cannot conceive that it could be necessary. This is a far greater retention of control than is exercised over any State capital by the legislature, or over foreign capitals by their governments. Other cities flourish with far more local control—flourish, I am bound to say, a great deal better than the District does under congressional government.

What more can reasonable men ask? What possible real danger can be seen in such a system?

I think it is time that this House demonstrated its willingness to consider with an open mind the restoration of democracy to our Capital City. After these many years of delay, we are entitled to ask a reasonable opportunity to debate and vote on this bill. There is no excuse for further delay in holding hearings on home rule legislation and I think we should get on with it. Lets have some hearings on this matter now.

Mr. DEROUNIAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEROUNIAN. Mr. Speaker, for some time I have been watching with interest the game being played in this House on the subject of self-government for the District of Columbia. The cynical observer of our political system might find it amusing. I do not and I do not think many Americans do. Most Americans respect our system of government. They believe in majority rule under the Constitution. They believe that committees of this House are its agents, not its masters. So they cannot find this game very amusing.

Control of the committees, the procedure and the policy of this House supposedly rests with the majority and the opposition party is in the majority. They, like the Republican Party, supposedly endorse home rule for the District. But in fact, control, procedure and policy on this issue apparently do not rest with the majority.

The game is a simple one. Supposedly, both parties are committed to home rule for the District of Columbia. But nothing ever happens. I believe a majority of the House wants to enact home rule.

And so, while the majority party that is supposed to control the House sits back and submits, we see the same old game. Year after year, there are the same vague reports of hearings to be held on home rule—maybe—sometime. We Republicans cannot compel action. But we are prepared to honor our party's pledge and our President's recommendation and to pass home rule.

It is really up to the Democrats. They have control of the House, not we. They control the committees, appoint the committee chairmen. If their party pledge is to be honored, they will have to take the steps to do so.

Mr. Speaker, home rule has been solemnly endorsed as part of the official program of both parties. A large number of members of both parties want a chance to enact this legislation. Many Members, including members of the District Committee, have sponsored the bill and have asked for early hearings. The Senate is about to give its approval to home rule for the fifth time in 10 years. Is it going to die in this House again, without hearings or consideration, for the fifth time in 10 years, in spite of the desire of many members that, at least, it have its day in court?

I put the question squarely to the majority party in this House, which has the authority and the responsibility to answer these questions. Are we going to get prompt hearings? Are we going to have a chance to vote on this bill?

I will await with interest the outcome of this game.

I do know that the issue has been stalled, evaded, obscured and just plain blocked, year after year. We hear the same old mock-solemn worries about constitutionality, even though home rule has been proved constitutional by everyone from the Founding Fathers to the present Supreme Court. The same old talk about more urgent and more important legislation to be considered first. The same old talk about the serious legislative problems to be solved—although the Senate has solved them time after time and no one can tell us what they are. Just why is it that problems that do not exist on the other side of the Capitol suddenly appear when the bills get over here?

I am no prophet, but it is easy to predict where the game goes from here. The chairman of the committee says there will be hearings—but not for a while yet. The subcommittee chairman has not heard that he is going to hold hearings—he has not made any plans and he has other bills scheduled. So the buckpassing and the stalling go on. Hearings will be put off as long as possible. Maybe, eventually, we will get a day or two of perfunctory hearings when it is too late to do anything about it. Then, if the managers of the game have their way, the thing will die there. I challenge anyone to dispute this statement—as history, as present fact, or as prediction.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to be proven a poor prophet on this issue. I would like to believe that those few who are in the saddle on this issue are not going to play this cynical game again this year. But there is nothing I or my party can do about it. The Republicans do not control this House or its committees.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members of the House who desire to do so may have permission to extend their remarks on the subject just discussed at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I commend the distinguished gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FOLEY] for bringing to the attention of the House the matter of self-government for the District of Columbia. In so doing he has rendered a service to his country the more significant because at a time when we are seeking the friendship of peoples in awakening lands who desire for themselves the right of self-determination it is difficult for them to understand why in the United States we deny the exercise of the right of self-determination to our fellow Americans who live closest to our National Capitol. I have supported home rule for the District of Columbia in all the Congresses of which I have been a Member. I confidently expect that from the 86th Congress will come the legislation that so long has been demanded by every rule of decency and every precept of democracy. But we cannot be halted by a roadblock.

Those who have seemed determined to deny this House an opportunity to consider self-government for the District have told us that the Nation's Capital is too important to turn over to local control. They tell us the national interest demands the careful, wise guidance of Congress, with its national point-of-view.

This is an argument that has no basis in reality. In the first place, nobody wants Congress to give up its power. Under the Constitution Congress must and will, with any form of government, retain ultimate control. It will have the final voice on policy. It will have all the power it needs to insure that the national capital is governed according to the national interest.

In the second place, self-government for the District will enable Congress to do a better job of supervision. Congress does not govern the District now. Two of its Committees do. Even they do not have the time to do the kind of job they would wish. Frequently Members have to be drafted to serve and frequently they get off at the first opportunity. In the other body, one able member of the Committee quit this year and another who had served on the House District Committee served public notice that he would not go on the District Committee in the other body.

Congressional government of the District just does not interest the members of Congress. When the District appropriations bill was on the floor recently, only 28 members found the time and had the interest to show up to vote. In contrast, when there was threatened a bad financial mess, hundreds of local citizens turned out for hearings on the appropriations bill in the Committee of the other body. They filled every chair and overflowed a large hearing room. That is the kind of public interest that is necessary for the efficient functioning of representative government.

We have waited long enough—too long. Sentiment in this House overwhelmingly supports prompt hearings and action on home rule legislation. I join respectfully but emphatically with the many Members who are requesting the District Committee to act without further delay.

"WASHINGTON WINDOW"

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. FORRESTER] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. FORRESTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORRESTER. Mr. Speaker, the Cordele Dispatch, a daily newspaper published at Cordele, Ga., in its edition of April 15, 1959, page 8, has an article entitled "Washington Window," by Lyle C. Wilson, United Press International, and the following was contained therein:

THE POLITICAL UNDERTOW

U.S. Communists are ballyhooing a Youth March on Washington timed for next Saturday, April 18. It will be a propaganda protest march in behalf of further Federal action on civil rights for Negroes. The demonstrators will march by bus from cities as distant as Chicago, according to the Sunday Worker, publication of the Communist Party, U.S.A. The marchers probably will peacefully picket the White House, a well tested propaganda tactic. A delegation will seek audience with President Eisenhower and fail, a sure fire publicity gimmick.

The information from "Washington Window" being of interest to me, I asked the Library of Congress to furnish me with the Sunday Worker, publications of the Communist Party, U.S.A., for April, and the Sunday, April 5, 1959, issue carried on page 2 thereof the following:

APRIL 18 YOUTH MARCH WIDENS CALL FOR RIGHTS

(By T. R. Bassett)

The April 18 youth march on Washington which started out as an action for speedy integration of the schools has been broadened out to a march for the total victory of equal rights for all. The new call released by the march committee declared, "We won't take no for an answer."

In Chicago a spokesman for the local organizing body announced that 40,000 signatures on the petition to the President had been turned in to headquarters and another 40,000 had been collected but were not yet brought in.

Three hundred young people in Chicago have already announced they intend to participate in the march.

A. Philip Randolph, march chairman, said that 14 members of the Puerto Rican House of Representatives had signed the petition.

Randolph said the youth marchers will call upon all Americans to join in a great campaign for civil rights legislation covering every aspect of life, including unemployment and housing as well as education.

He saw the action as the beginning of a national crusade demanding the passage by Congress of the Douglas-Celler-Javits-Powell civil rights bill. He termed the measures submitted by Senator LYNDON JOHNSON and the White House totally inadequate.

He attacked conditional agreements with Dixiecrats and Dixiecrat inspired civil rights legislation.

An estimated 20,000 marchers, Negro and white, will converge on Washington April 18.

Randolph predicted that the signatures collected will be more than doubled.

The White House, leaders of the youth march said last week, had assured them by letter that the President would meet a representative delegation of Negro and white students who will present the petitions. During a similar march last October 25, a youth delegation was rebuffed at the White House gates.

The special statement issued last week said in part:

"We march—

"For the traditional rights of free speech, of suffrage, of due process, of equal protection under the law.

"In protest against these vicious attacks [on the Supreme Court] and call upon these executive and legislative branches to back up the Supreme Court.

"To pass the Douglas-Celler-Javits-Powell bill.

"To protest minority rule in Congress.

"To confront the President directly with the conviction of young people that he must use all of his powers to bring about the speedy integration of the schools.

"To demand for every American, every single right guaranteed by the Constitution, political, civil, and social.

A rally of youth is scheduled by the Chicago sponsoring committee on Sunday, April 11, 2 to 6 p.m., at the Packing Center, 4859 South Wabash.

Petitions have been circulated in Hyde Park, Du Sable, and Dunbar High Schools, and the committee is awaiting permission from the board of education to circulate them throughout the school system. Individual supporters of the march report excellent response from Negro and white students as well as teachers to request all signatures.

Delegations from the University of Chicago, Roosevelt University, Wheaton College, and Chicago Teachers College are already organized, it was announced.

Steel union locals, dining car employees, sleeping car porters, packing, auto, and retail clerks union locals, as well as many churches have given support to the march.

Detroit: The reports here are that two busloads of Detroit youth are going to Washington April 18.

Carrying a coffin with the slogan "Segregation must die too," the Negro and white youth staged a "drum up" march last Saturday for the April 18 event.

The young marchers walked slowly from Grand Circus Park down Woodland Avenue, the city's main thoroughfare to city hall and from there to the Detroit Board of Education to protest segregation in Detroit schools.

A preparations committee of more than 50 youth, Negro and white, meets Monday nights at the Peoples Church, Woodward at Pingree Avenue where petitions are turned in.

Berkeley, Calif.: A bay area committee has been formed to support the April youth march. Among sponsors are labor leaders, entertainers, ministers, educators, and leaders in the Negro community.

The Evening Star, Washington, D.C., Wednesday, April 15, 1959, issue, page B–7, carried the following article:

FIFTEEN THOUSAND TO MARCH TO PROMOTE LAWS FOR INTEGRATION

More than 15,000 white and colored persons will meet here Saturday on behalf of school integration and civil rights legislation.

The group has scheduled a march from Seventh Street and Madison Drive on the Mall to the Washington Monument and then south to the Sylvan Theater. The march is to begin at 2 p.m. Saturday and the mass meeting at the theater is scheduled from 3:15 to 5 p.m.

Citations for contributions to the cause of integration will be presented to Ralph McGill, editor of the Atlanta Constitution; Mrs. Daisy Bates, the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jackie Robinson, Harry Golden, Harry Belafonte, Lillian Smith, Sidney Poitier, Roy Wilkins and the Rev. Gardner Taylor.

The 1959 Youth March for Integrated Schools will bring petitions here, signed by citizens throughout the country, calling for "speedy integration of schools throughout the United States."

The march was initiated at a meeting of more than 10,000 young people here last October 25. It will signal the beginning of a national campaign for immediate school integration and the passage of the Douglas civil rights bill.

The Albany Herald, daily newspaper published in Albany, Ga., April 17, 1959, issue, carried a UPI story as follows:

NAACP TO HOLD YOUTH RALLY IN WASHINGTON

WASHINGTON.—The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People will hold its annual youth rally here Saturday with 15,000 to 20,000 youngsters expected to participate.

The NAACP said delegates would march from their downtown headquarters to a theater for a mass meeting. Speakers will include the Rev. Martin Luther King, leader of a civil rights movement at Montgomery, Ala., and LeRoy Wilkins, NAACP executive secretary.

Of course, the Saturday referred to in the last quoted article was April 18, and the rally referred to therein was undoubtedly the same rally referred to in the Sunday Worker.

In the article of April 15 appearing in the Washington Evening Star, the name of Ralph McGill, editor of the Atlanta Constitution, led all of the rest of the persons to receive a citation for contributions to the cause of integration, even ahead of Rev. Martin Luther King, Daisy Bates and Jackie Robinson.

Down in Georgia, Mr. McGill has vigorously denied doing anything to contribute to the cause of integration. Nevertheless, many in Georgia believe that Mr. McGill is and has been an integrationist and believes that the group knew what they were doing when they decided he should have a citation.

SMALL BUSINESS TAX REFORM AND REVISION

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCCULLOCH] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. MCCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, my colleagues, Mr. MOORE, of West Virginia, Mr. AVERY, of Kansas, Mr. SMITH, of California, Mr. ROBISON, of New York, Mr. QUIE, of Minnesota, and I, members of the House Small Business Committee, have introduced identical small business tax reform bills.

Our present small tax reform bill contains provisions which were included in legislation which we introduced on March 6, 1957, in the 1st session of the 85th Congress.

Our previous bill contained 11 reform adjustments amending the Internal Revenue Code, 3 of which were enacted by the 85th Congress. Therefore, our present bill includes proposed amendments to the Internal Revenue Code not previously enacted, all in the interest of small business tax reform.

The three amendments referred to above were included in Public Law 866, 85th Congress, 2d session, and were as follows:

First. Allows investors who lose money in small-business ventures to write off their losses against ordinary income up to $25,000 a year—$50,000 in the case of a joint return by husband and wife.

Second. Allows small corporations with, say 10 or fewer stockholders the option of being taxed as if they were partnerships.

Third. Allows payment of estate taxes attributable to ownership in a closely held business over a period of 10 years.

Public Law 866 of the 85th Congress also made adjustments in the operating loss carryback and provided for an increase of the minimum accumulated earnings credit. In addition, Public Law 866 makes an allowance which increases first-year depreciation or credit on the first $10,000 invested in depreciable tangible property, either new or used. In the case of a joint return of husband and wife the allowance is increased to $20,000. Within the foregoing limitations, the amendment permits a 20-percent allowance in the year of acquisition, in addition to depreciating the remaining 80 percent under existing schedules.

Our bill—H.R. 562, and the following, of the 85th Congress—would have allowed rapid tax amortization over a 5-year period. As we pointed out at the time, smaller concerns received little benefit under the rapid amortization program during the World War II or the Korean war periods. However, since this program has declined in use, we are more in favor of measures which will permit funds to be plowed back into the business.

TAX REFORM AND REVISION FOR SMALL BUSINESS IS NEEDED—NOT TAX RELIEF

The fundamental principle which motivates us in introducing tax legislation is reform and revision of certain sections of the Internal Revenue Code in the interest of small business. We do not and cannot conceive lasting benefit from mere tax relief. We do not even like the term "tax relief." Small business is not a mendicant but represents the broad base on which our entire business economy rests. The latent strength of our small business economy of today is the assurance of a vigorous and healthy business economy in the tomorrows to come.

Unless we are willing to face up to the responsibility of providing the means by which our small business institutions may grow and expand on a sound, constructive basis, we will reach these tomorrows with a faltering business structure. This, our enemies, current and potential, desires above all else. A strong America is the keystone of a free world.

GROWTH, EXPANSION, AND MODERNIZATION

In the bill which we introduced on March 7, 1957, the emphasis was placed on the ability of small business to plow back earnings into the business for growth, expansion and modernization. Section 2 of that bill and section 2 of our present bill would permit small business concerns to deduct against ordinary income up to a total of $33,500 for the expansion or modernization of small business facilities.

Many bills have been introduced incorporating this principle since the introduction of our bill in the early days of the 85th Congress. The most popular limitation seems to be $30,000. We do not quarrel with this or any similar figure so long as the basic principle is maintained in any legislation which in the future may be enacted.

Our bill incorporates an allowable deduction at different taxable income levels up to a maximum taxable income of $150,000. This is because it is our conviction that the greatest incentives should be provided at the lower taxable income levels. The smaller the concern the greater the difficulty in finding a way to plow back earnings into the business. Moreover, the smaller the earnings may be in a business and assuming a sound, well managed business operation, the greater the difficulty in securing equity financing and long-term loans. Therefore, the only realistic solution and the most needed tax reform for small business is the ability to plow earnings directly back into the business. Small business cannot depend on tax relief or fringe benefits such as is included in Public Law 866 of the 85th Congress for either equity or working capital.

SMALL BUSINESS TAX POLICY

Credit and equity capital are necessary collateral requirements for business health and prosperity, but the ability of a business once established to plow back earnings is the one component which is absolutely necessary for a well balanced financial business structure. Unless we can remove the impediments which prevent earnings from being plowed back into the business and which are basically responsible for the lack of credit and capital, for increased mergers, for many small business failures, impediments which retard small business growth and expansion, we shall have failed in our objectives.

In broadening the tax base by permitting small concerns adequate plowback provisions our revenue would be increased in a relatively short period of time because of the earning capacity which would be added to our taxable structure. In a previous statement we made this point:

> It is sometimes alleged that the loss of revenue, which immediate tax reductions might cause, would weaken the fiscal program of the Nation. We believe, however, that the encouragement of opportunity and expansion for small business, which carefully considered tax reform would bring about, would have beneficial ramifications throughout our economy. We believe the result would create sufficient new wealth through increased productivity and employment and that a generally broadened tax base would inevitably follow. Thus, in approving needed tax revision, we would be insulating our free enterprise system against the corrosive damage of this mobilization era and, at the same time, creating a climate for increased employment and productivity, which are the conditions essential to the functioning of our system of taxation and our fiscal policy.

Some of the points which should be included in any consideration of small business tax policy are:

First. Recognition of the importance of small and new businesses and a tax policy which encourages freedom of entry into business.

Second. Recognition of the necessity for a tax system which will stimulate incentive and provide growth and one which will not penalize either large or small firms.

Third. Recognition of the importance of a tax structure which has a minimum impact on the competitive relations of large and small firms. This is a necessary corollary to our free-enterprise system.

Fourth. Recognition that the tax problem is the basic financial problem of most well-managed small business concerns. One problem of small and medium sized concerns in financing is the inability to float equity issues or to borrow in the most fruitful money markets.

Fifth. Recognition that the inherent difficulty of small and medium sized business concerns in growth, expansion, and modernization is the inability to plow earnings back into the business.

Sixth. Recognition that product diversification enjoyed by larger concerns in the manufacturing and processing industries enables such concerns to grow at a pace which smaller concerns cannot match.

Earnings of small and medium sized concerns have a tendency to fluctuate more, year in and year out, than larger businesses. In a period of rising prosperity these concerns accelerate their profit take rapidly. In declining periods the descent to a break even or loss position is reached more quickly by most small concerns, particularly in the field of manufacturing and processing. Therefore, adequate reserves can only be built up in rising markets and then only if the tax system will permit the accumulation of such reserves.

Neither large nor small business should be looked upon as tax targets to produce a given amount of revenues. Business as a whole, for tax purposes, should not be taxed on the basis that certain earnings—past and prospective—will yield a certain number of dollars. Rather, the effect of taxes on earnings as well as the effect on future taxes should be considered. The question might well be asked: Will these proposed tax rates stifle and retard business so that in effect the tax base will shrink and decrease revenue or will these tax rates encourage business to grow and expand their markets and, thereby broaden the tax base and in effect increase revenue?

We have come to the time or we are approaching the time when all Federal income taxes demand revision. There must be a limitation in both corporate and individual tax rates which precludes the confiscatory aspects now present in parts of our tax structure.

Because of the large Federal debt, the necessity for continued large expenditures for national defense and for many other reasons in connection with our Federal Government, the tax bill will be large for a long time to come. Reductions will occur through careful budgetary management. However, in full recognition of these facts, it is all the more reason that we should constantly strive to bring more and more equity into our income tax structure.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CURTIS] stated in separate views on the Small Tax Revision Act of 1958—House Report No. 2198, 85th Congress, 2d session—on July 16, 1958:

> This bill is called a tax-revision bill to avoid argument about the equities of where tax relief should be applied. However, the bill has been deprived of its revision features; the philosophy that calls for tax revision for small business has been eliminated and we have only a shell which covers pure and simple tax relief.
>
> The Federal tax levy on earnings which is the basic source of financing for the growth of small business lies at the base of the increased number of uneconomic mergers and acquisitions of small businesses. Good economic and good social policy call for a healthy climate for small business and an opportunity to compete economically with the bigger competitor. No one benefits when business becomes highly concentrated.
> It is this situation that calls for tax revision in the area of small business. If the theory is right, tax revision to remove these uneconomic barriers to growth would produce revenue gain, not losses. It would be tax relief only in the sense that uneconomic barriers to growth embedded in the tax system were being removed.

We agree with Mr. CURTIS, a distinguished member of the Ways and Means Committee, and we have made similar comment many times in discussing tax revision and reform for small business. We further agree with Mr. CURTIS that "certainly the hand-to-mouth procedures we are following today are full of errors. The Treasury estimates of anticipated revenues have been notoriously inaccurate over a period of years." This statement pointed up a fact that we have stressed on many occasions, namely, that too often tax reform and revision is put aside because of two primary excuses—first, loss of revenue, and, second, difficulty of administration.

We have also previously stated for the record our agreement with the conclusions of a report issued December 27, 1955, by the Subcommittee on Tax Policy of the Joint Economic Committee which made a comprehensive study under the chairmanship of the present distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. MILLS, of Arkansas. In this report the subcommittee said:

> Federal tax policy in the future should protect the competitive position of small and new businesses by providing adequate tax offsets to business risks and by gearing the structure of tax rates to any differential barriers to acquiring the financial resources required for their growth and development.

The report also stated without equivocation that:

> Federal tax policy should protect and promote an atmosphere favorable for small and new businesses.

We believe that one of the most important reasons for small business tax reform and revision, which will provide the means and incentives for growth and modernization, is the socialistic clamor for nationalization of industries. Unless we broaden the base and provide for the growth of small and medium sized businesses we shall inevitably be confronted with a greater merger problem than we now have. We do not believe that we should allow our tax structure to encourage mergers and consolidations which will eventually decrease the number of our industrial concerns to a minimum. In other words, we believe there are many industrial endeavors which require a large operation and, therefore, we do not intend to convey the idea that we are against big business as such. We do wish to point out, however, that bigness is something on which Congress should keep a watchful eye. We should do this with the thought in mind that we do not intend to allow the day to come when all business and industry will be cartelized to the total disadvantage of the utimate consumer.

After all in framing our antitrust laws and in framing all legislation, including tax legislation, we must keep in mind the burden we share in common. We must always keep in mind the welfare and the protection of the individual ultimate consumer, those who in the final analysis pay the total tax bill.

FAMILY SIZE FARMS

In our present bill and in previous tax measures which we have introduced we gave recongition to the fact that modern farming is a business. Small farmers, whether they own the farms or farm in the capacity of renters or tenants, encounter similar problems to those which confront small businessmen. Modern farming requires modern machinery. The advance in technology has had the same impact on agricultural pursuits as it has in the manufacturing, processing or extraction industries. The equipment used in farming operations is expensive and the useful life of modern farming equipment is perhaps even less than in many other industries.

The farm plant requires more and better buildings than was the case before the age of machinery. All these considerations serve to emphasize the fact that family-size farms and farmers need exactly the same tax reform and revision that is needed by small business. The ability to plow back earnings is an absolute essential if we are to retain the very desirable family enterprise in our agricultural economy.

Thus, we include farms and farmers in our bill in consideration of the vital role of this way of life in our Nation.

EXPLANATION OF BILL

In brief, the purposes of the bill are spelled out in section I as follows:

To provide for growth, expansion, and modernization for small and independent business enterprises engaged in trade or commerce;

To permit individuals and partnerships filing income tax returns for small and independent businesses engaged in trade or commerce to revoke an election to be taxed as a corporation; to provide a normal tax rate of 20 percent for taxable years after June 30, 1959, and to increase the surtax exemption;

To provide a growth, expansion, and modernization exemption on net taxable earnings for small and independent businesses engaged in trade or commerce;

To liberalize the income tax treatment of losses incurred through loans to small and independent business enterprises engaged in trade or commerce;

To provide small and independent business an exemption for goodwill in the determination of the value of an estate;

To provide family-sized farmers and others engaged in agricultural pursuits an exemption for the improvement, modernization and renewal of buildings or equipment used in the production, care, and marketing of farm products; and

To provide family-sized farms, whether or not such farms are owned in fee or occupied by renters or tenants, an exemption for the improvement, modernization, and renewal of buildings or equipment used in the production, care, and marketing of the products of such farms.

DEDUCTION FOR EXPANSION OR MODERNIZATION OF SMALL BUSINESS ENTERPRISE

Section 2, probably the most important section of the bill, would permit small firms to take varying exemptions on their taxable income for plant expansion, modernization, and improvement. This section would permit the small operator earning less than $150,000 a year to "treat expenditures which are paid or incurred by him during the taxable year for the construction, reconstruction, erection, installation, improvement, or acquisition of any facility, land building, machinery or equipment, or any part thereof, used in the trade or business as expenses which are not chargeable to capital account."

Designed to provide the greatest incentive to small firms with relatively low taxable income, this section provides for the following table of deductions:

If the small firm's taxable income is not over $10,000, it may deduct for modernization and expansion purposes up to 50 percent of its taxable income; from $10,000 to $25,000, it may deduct $5,000 plus 40 percent of the excess of taxable income over $10,000; from $25,000 to $50,000, it may deduct $11,000 plus 30 percent of the excess over $25,000; from $50,000 to $100,000, it may deduct $18,500 plus 20 percent of the excess over $50,000; from $100,000 to $150,000, it may deduct $28,500 plus 10 percent of the excess over $100,000.

REDUCTION IN CORPORATE NORMAL TAX

Section 3 would reduce the normal corporate tax rate from the present 30 percent to 20 percent. Based on the premise that the corporate normal tax should be low, this section aims at increasing the resistance of small firms to sell out or to merge with their larger competitors, encouraging them to adopt the corporate form of doing business, and lessening their burden of obtaining working capital.

INCREASE IN CORPORATE SURTAX EXEMPTION

Section 4 would exempt firms earning up to $150,000 a year from the 22 percent corporate surtaxes now applicable to companies earning about $25,000. To offset the loss of revenue from this increased exemption, additional revenue could be obtained by increasing surtax rates at levels above $150,000.

ELECTION OF INDIVIDUALS AND PARTNERSHIPS TO BE TAXED AS CORPORATIONS

Section 5 would permit small firms to elect to be taxed either as a small business or as a corporation so that decisions whether to incorporate will be made on factors other than taxes. This section would particularly benefit small firms having stockholders with modest incomes.

LOANS TO SMALL BUSINESS ENTERPRISES

Section 6 would provide an incentive for persons to lend to small firms by provding them with more liberal treatment for losses on bad debts than the law presently allows. This section would stimulate the flow of private individual loans to small firms by permitting persons to charge off a bad debt against ordinary income.

DEPRECIATION OF USED PROPERTY

Section 7 would provide small firms with accelerated depreciation on their purchases of used equipment or property. This section would particularly aid small firms which are often forced to start in business by buying an old building, used machinery, or used display equipment.

EXEMPTION FOR GOODWILL IN DETERMINING GROSS ESTATE

Section 8 would provide an exemption from estate taxes for the so-called goodwill of a firm as an incentive to its owners to continue the business after the death of one of its leading figures. The law at present allows the Internal Revenue Service to include the value of goodwill in computing estate taxes.

The full text of our bill follows:

A BILL TO AMEND THE INTERNAL REVENUE CODE TO ASSIST SMALL AND INDEPENDENT BUSINESS, AND FOR OTHER PURPOSES

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. DECLARATION OF PURPOSE AND POLICY.

It is hereby declared to be the policy of the Congress, and the purpose of this Act—
